U.S. Envoy Links Aid to El Salvador To Human Rights

By Joanne Omang and Christopher Dickey

Washington Post Service
SAN SALVADOR — U.S. Ambassador Deane R. Hinton has spoken for the first time of "senous excesses" by the government of El Salvador in its war against guerrillas and warned that Congress will refuse further aid if the human rights situation here does battle," Mr. Hinton said in a speech Thursday night to a busi-ness group, "but there is a limit, and at times this government has treaded dangerously close to that

Mr. Hinton said he welcomed the recent legal action against the accused killers of four American churchwomen. But he added, "Salvadoran authorities, and you, the people of El Salvador, have tolerated serious excesses." He said he fully supports government efforts "to cut these abuses. Indeed, our future assistance is dependent on such improvement.

If there is one issue which could force our Congress to withdraw or seriously reduce its support for El Salvador, it is the issue of human rights," Mr. Hinton said. Congress in December called for a cutoff of all U.S. military assistance unless the Reagan administration could certify that the Salvadoran government was moving to contain human rights abuses by its armed forces against civilians.

The administration made the certification Jan. 28, based in part on reporting from the embassy that the number of noncombatant deaths attributed to the military had decreased. A number of congressmen have disputed the administration's findings.

In a recent Newsweek interview, Mr. Duarte said the international media were giving a picture of events in his country that was dis-torted in favor of the rebels. "We are losing the fight with the guerrillas not only in the countryside, but in the pages of The New York Times and The Washington Post,"

Mr. Duarte Thursday declared the guilt of six of the former guardsmen in the case of the American churchwomen. The suspects, who were arraigned Wednesday in the small provincial capital of Zacatecohica, have not been formally charged. A civil court judge has until Saturday to evaluate the evidence and decide whether to proceed to trial. Mr. Duarte, speaking in a televi-sion address, said that a thorough investigation had concluded that the six suspects are "the only and the true guilty ones."

There have been frequent accu-

Duarte's Account

As Mr. Duarte described the case, the chain of events leading to the murder began when National Guard Cpl Margarito Perez Nieto and guardsman Alirio Elber Orantes Menjivar, stationed around the El Salvador International Airport, saw Ursuline Sister Dorothy Kazel and Jean Donovan, a Roman Catholic lay worker, arrive in a white Toyota minibus Dec. 2, 1980.

"The ex-guardsmen said that the handbags in which they could hide weapons, and because of that they decided to observe them from afar," Mr. Duarte said.

After Sister Kazel and Miss Donovan had picked up two nuns at the airport and driven away, the corporal called up a sub-sergeant. Luis Antonio Colindres, Aleman and told him about "the presence of these women and their suspicious attitude," Mr. Duarte said.

The sub-sergeant told the corporal to be careful, according to Mr. Duarte's account, and when Sister Kazel and Miss Donovan returned in the minibus at about 5 p.m. to pick up two other nuns, the corporal and his comrade went to the airport command post. Shortly afterward, the sub-ser-

Budget Shifts Rejected On U.S. Taxes, Military

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan said Friday the administration was open to new ideas for reducing the government's budget deficit but re-mained opposed to raising taxes or nating military spending.

Noting that President Reagan had talked of giving Congress "running room" to consider alternative budget proposals, the secre-tary said at a news conference, "We are always open to a better plan."

"But I want to re-emphasize."
Mr. Regan said, "that we expect that plan to be constructive, and not one that destroys the very fabric of the Reagan program."

Mr. Regan criticized a proposal by Sen. Ernest Hollings, Democrat of South Carolina, to freeze spending for social and defense programs at 1982 levels, delay this year's scheduled income tax cut and reduce next year's planned tax reduction.

But he also ruled out changes in the defense budget and the tax cuts scheduled for this July and July of the following year.

"That's obviously totally out of the question," Mr. Baker said. He called the defense budget and the tax cuts "the heart and soul of the president's program."

Mr. Baker, in a television interview, said that Mr. Reagan "is convinced, fundamentally con-vinced, the foundation for economic recovery has been laid; there's no running room as far as

He Salutes Moslems, Says Mass in Stadium

The Associated Press LAGOS — Pope John Paul II, starting his first foreign trip since the assassination attempt against him in May, arrived here Friday to a 21-gun salute and tribal greeters dancing to the beat of drums.

He proclaimed his respect for the values of Nigeria's Moslem majority and later gave thanks to the Christian faithful who nearly filled the 100,000-seat National Stadium for a late afternoon Mass. "The acceptance of Christian faith here in Nigeria has indeed been remarkable, the pope told a cheering crowd after circling the in an open-topped limousine. With eager hearts, you have welcomed generations zealous missionaries to your land."

Earlier, at the capital's Murtala Muhammed Airport, the pope spoke of the Moslem majority saying: "I earnestly hope that my sence among you will express the love and respect that I have for all of you, as well as my esteem for the worthy religious values that

His visit was expected to give a new boost to the flourishing Roman Catholic Church in Africa, where an estimated 2 million people are baptized each year and the number of Catholics is expected to reach 55 million this year. By the year 2000, the Vatican expects 18 percent of the continent's people will be Catholic, compared with ) percent a century ago.

Less than 15 percent of Niger-ia's 56 million inhabitants are Catholics. But broadcasts by leaders of the Moslem community, estimated to number 30 million, welcomed the pope as "a holy and noble man who loves us all." and many tribal chiefs placed advertisements in Lagos newspapers to express their respect. The pope was expected to preach the same message that he gave on his two previous trips to Africa, when he urged followers to let African traditions flourish but to remain faithful to the laws of the church. He made clear during his last trip, in 1980, that the laws of the church should be paramount, and he is expected to reaf-

MADRID - The Soviet Union abandoned efforts Friday to block discussion of the Poland crisis at the Madrid Conference on Securi-Western foreign ministers resumed their attacks on the Warsaw military government for suppressing the Solidarity union movement. The switch in Soviet tactics appeared to spring from an awareness that the Warsaw Pact had suffered severe damage to its image Tuesday when Poland, which chaired that day's session, touched off an angry, seven-hour procedur-al dispute and prevented eight foreign ministers from speaking.

Interpreting the Soviet decision to back off from threats to disrupt Friday's plenary session, Willibald Pahr, the Austrian foreign minister, said: "Everyone was aware that those who prevent speakers from speaking are against dialogue, and the point of this conference is to promote dialogue."

A Finnish diplomat was blunter: The Soviets were hurt."

Taking the floor Friday after having been blocked Tuesday, the French external affairs minister.

Mr. Wiejacz said that an accusathe Soviet Union had instigated martial law was "nonsense and an insult," and he argued that Western criticism would impede the opening of a national dialogue in Poland.

He claimed that Radio Free Europe, a U.S.-supported station that operates from Munich, had broadcast coded instructions on the organization of resistance against the martial-law government of Gen.

Wojciech Jaruzelski.
"If your aims are to complicate our already difficult internal situation so that you can use Poland as a pretext for your strategic game, said Mr. Wiejacz, addressing West-ern delegates, "then we repeat that your effort is doomed to failure. We shall do all we can to see that the crisis in Poland is not used against the interests of détente and stability in Europe." The continuing polemics have left little hope for the future of the Madrid conference. Washington Post Service JERUSALEM - The sale of U.S.-made Hawk mobile anti-air-craft missiles and F-16 fighters to Jordan would be a threat to Israel's security and would be strongly opposed, Foreign Minister Yitzhak

Legionnaire Killed in Corsica Amid Spate of Attacks

From Agency Dispatches

AJACCIO, Corsica — Corsican nationalists launched 26 bombs and gun attacks on this island Friday, and declared that the "honeymoon" was over between the militants and the Socialist government of France,

During the night, attackers killed a Foreign Legionnaire guard of the French Army and wound-ed another at a rest camp. A masked gumman also wounded a French Air Force officer in a separate attack at a French military base at Solenzara.

The attackers scrawled on walls around the island the initials "ISF," which stand for the Corsican language equivalent of "French Go Home."

"The promised process of decolonization has not been carried out," the Corsican National Liberation Front said in tracts explaining the attacks. Twenty-four French businesses, homes, farms, tourist facilities and police stations were bombed. The nationalists also blew up offices of the French electricity facility in Aix-en-Provence and Marseilles in southern France.

LONDON — About 1,700 employees of Laker Airways were dismissed Friday as a result of the collapse of Sir Freddie Laker's attempt to build an airline around low-fare transatlantic flights.

And a battle shaped up over whether Britain's Civil Aviation Authority should grant Sir Freddie a license for the new airline he hopes to create soon in partnership with British financier Roland Rowland. The opposition Labor Party called for an inquiry into the Laker Airway failure before any new licenses are issued.

The dismissal notices were handed out by the receivers who are trying to sort out Laker Airway's financial affairs. Some dismissed workers expressed anger when they learned that they would get only two weeks' severance pay instead of the four weeks they had been expecting.

IRS Warns of Overpayments Tied to Interest Statements

By Nancy L Ross

Washington Past Service WASHINGTON - The Internal Revenue Service has warned that many investors may be overpaying their 1981 taxes because some financial institutions have made mistakes in filing dividend and interest income statements. The difficulty centers on that portion of the interest and dividends that qualify for exclusion. Single persons may exclude up to $200, and married couples filing jointly may exclude up to $400.

Form 1099 for 1981 lists the interest payments that qualify for exclusion in Column 1 and the payments that do not qualify in Col-umn 2. This is a change from the 1980 form on which interest from savings and loans and credit unions was listed in Column 1, and other interest on bank deposits and corporate bonds was listed in

An IRS representative, Ellen Murphy, said that either through failure to reprogram their computers or through ignorance some fi-nancial institutions were continuing to list eligible payments under the 1980 system.

The result is causing confusion for taxpayers. Many who have filed their 1981 returns have not taken the exclusions due them, and hundreds have contacted the IRS asking for clarification. Exemptions

• Interest earned on participa-tion shares of a trust established under federal law. However, interest paid to taxpayers by individuals cannot be excluded.

U.S. Military Advisers in El Salvador Videotaped Carrying Combat Rifles

SAN SALVADOR — Three U.S. military advisers assigned here have been videotaped carrying M-16 automatic rifles and other combat equipment in an eastern part of the country where contact with guerrillas is frequent. The men were supervising a Salvadoran construction crew.

The incident Thursday, taped by a Cable News Network crew, was the first in which reporters had observed any of the 50 U.S. advisers here carrying combat arms in a part of El Salvador where the guerrilla presence is strong. Because of U.S. congressional concern over the role of the military advisers, the Reagan administration has given assurances that their activities are restricted to areas firmly controlled by the government.

[President Reagan ordered a "full report" Friday from the Defense Department on the matter, United Press International reported from Washington. Mr. Reagan said he assumed the men were carrying the rifles "for personal protection and I think that's understandable. The policy is, we do not engage in combat. Nor were these gentlemen, as far as indicated, doing that at all."

The men were filmed as they walked along a road near the village of El Delirio, about 12 miles (19 kilometers) south of San Miguel, a provincial capital. They had been supervising the construction of a prefabricated bridge to replace one blown up by leftist insurgents. At least one of the men was wearing a web belt that bore what appeared to be M-79 grenades. All three were carrying M-16 rifles.

This budget request, however, is the left, according to the report, being described as a way of obtaining spending authority in case a politically motivated killings are decision is made to begin the train-ing program. The decision to spend "has not been made." a spend has not been made, State Department official said.

The administration's budget presentation, according to offi-cials, also will address "the possi-bility" of cash sales of military ecumment such as spare parts. But no decision has been made to authorize such sales, the officials added.

Guatemala has received no U.S. military assistance since the Carter administration terminated it in 1977 because of human rights abuses. The Reagan administra-tion has signaled for months that it would like to resume military sales and aid, but has been constrained by strong congressional opposition generated by reports of govern-ment death squads and other

No More Vietnams

Just a word about this Vietnam analogy that is coming to dominate the argument over El Salvador - over what is going on there and what the U.S. response, if any, should be. "It's just like Vietnam," people say portentously, the implication being that 1) the United States is on the wrong side of a popular revolution, 2) the information Americans are getting from the U.S. military and U.S. government is doctored, and 3) the whole thing is obviously just another "quagmire" so far as any type of U.S. effort to influence the outcome of events is concerned.

Now, all these things may be true. But their truth has certainly not been established or even persuasively argued, and the Vietnam analogy will do nothing to help confirm or refute it. In fact, the Vietnam analogy will degrade and hinder, not improve, analysis. There is, in the first place, something ever so slightly condescending and white-man's-burdenish about this attitude toward turmoil in Third World places: "When you've seen one you've seen them all." The commitment to finding one-on-one correspondences with Vietnam is also likely to lead people to ignore large and fundamental differences that don't fit the analogy.

But there is something else, something breathtakingly complacent and self-absorbed, about the constant invocation of the Vietnam analogy that troubles us even more. "It's just like Vietnam"- but by "Vietnam," many of those who keep invoking the analogy seem to mean only their own argument against the U.S. involvement there, and they seem very definitely to imply a cutoff date for the analogy. "Vietnam," in this sense.

simply ceases to exist after the spring of 1975. The horror of the Indochinese political fate - the repression and the misery, the tragic and eloquent statement of all those boat people — none of this evidently is meant to be included in the the meaning of the term "Vietnam."

It would no doubt be considered provocative and boorish to ask those who are working the analogy so hard whether they mean to suggest that the romantic, Robin-Hoodmodel, popular left forces in El Salvador would be likely, in triumph, to turn out to be as oppressive as those who ultimately prevailed in Indochina but who had once been considered agents of the people's will. And it would be a waste of time: Unlike Europeans, too few Americans have acknowledged what finally happened in Indochina.

The point is not to say that continued U.S. presence and pressure would have or could have made a difference. You can even argue that in certain important respects the U.S. presence and pressure contributed to the horrific political result. But the people who fought and argued so passionately against the U.S. effort and who so confidently misread the nature of the other side need to accommodate the fact of that misjudgment into their thinking. Vietnamese history did not cease with the U.S. disengagement, nor did it exactly improve.

Vietnam, as these critics rightly used to say, was not Munich, and thinking that it was certainly confounded and distorted U.S. policy there. We would add a corollary. El Salvador is not Vietnam.

Asking the Moon

By proposing such an immense new military budget, President Reagan may think he conveys an image of triumphant strength. In fact, the only victory is one of ideology over realism. As criticism from Republicans as well as Democrats already shows, proposing so much for the military in a time of economic distress and staggering deficits has only one sure effect: Cutbacks will be made. The only question is where.

"Cut defense!" has been an easy rallying cry for years. Too easy: New strength is needed — and the United States can afford to pay for it. But no nation can afford to pay for every weapon and every military strategy at once. Somebody must choose. By asking for the moon, the administration has stirred up enough opposition to endanger the defense improvements the nation needs.

The new Pentagon budget calls for more of everything. The military bill for the next five

But not even $1.6 trillion would buy everything the administration desires. It wants to be able to fight an improbable large "limited" nuclear war and also prolonged conventional wars in several parts of the globe at the same time. That can't be done, the Joint Chiefs of Staff believe, without much larger forces costing half again as much.

Yes, it would be desirable to increase general-purpose forces. Yes, it would be desirable to be able to move them quickly to Europe and the Gulf. Yes, it would be desirable to strengthen strategic nuclear forces. Yes, it would be nice to have a stronger navy. But what kind of sense does it make to lunge for all those goals at once? By asking for everything, Mr. Reagan demonstrates an incapacity to make the necessary choices - and invites Congress to rush in.

And what will Congress be tempted to do? What it has always done: Slash the accessible funds, for ammunition, spare parts, fuel, flight time and other aspects of combat readiness - just where defense has been bled most painfully.

With an eye on future deficits, some "bigticket" items need to be cut. But critics have to recognize that this would yield no quick payoff. Eliminating the $16 billion to be obligated next year for the MX missile, the B-1 bomber and two nuclear supercarriers, all unnecessary, could save $100 billion over the long run. But it would cut 1983 spending by less than $3 billion — not much compared with a deficit of $100 billion or more.

The next priority, therefore, should be for the course long urged by many military experts: Reduce total costs but still increase the number of weapons systems by shifting part of the buildup to more austere, less expensive ships and planes. And then the larger policy choices need to elled out B h the readiness of general-purpose forces; a 45-percent increase in funds for airlift and sealift over two years makes sense. There is no need for a 60-percent, two-year jump in strategic nuclear funds and a 100-percent, one-year increase in shipbuilding money.

Congress obviously must be involved in establishing military priorities — all the more so because of the need to review the rising pay levels needed to recruit a volunteer army. Another way to put that is to ask how long the United States is prepared to spend 60 percent of its military budget on personnel costs when Moscow pays half as much for forces twice as large.

Compared even with settling budget priorities, answering that kind of question will be politically murderous. The Reagan administration's defense budget, a letter to Santa, won't make it any easier. THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Television Diplomacy

It was a thoroughly good idea for the U.S. International Communications Agency to think of using global television for a program on Poland. Radio has long been a vehicle for U.S. "public diplomacy," as reaching out to foreign opinion is called in the bureaucracy, but television obviously has great potential. The technology is there. U.S. commercial television — Hollywood, if you like — long ago established its dominance in providing foreign audiences their favorite fare.

To be sure, many Americans are still a bit diffident about putting U.S. diplomacy on the tube. Radio, well, that's all right, but television — a little 1984-ish, perhaps? A little too close to propaganda? There's the dirty word. It embarrasses even some who engage in it. That is why they turn to "public diplomacy." But why not be open and use the term, propaganda, unapologetically, and use the medium, television, unapologetically, too? It's very democratic: No one is compelled to click on the set.

If TV diplomacy is to be extended, however, it has to be done a certain way. In this regard, we observe that, roughly speaking, two lines of criticism have been directed against "Let Poland Be Poland." The first is that the show simply wasn't good enough. Either there were too many politicians or too many actors, depending on your point of view; in any event, the show was uneven, not offensive but rarely as gripping as the Polish material itself. There is a certain intellectual superciliousness in some of this criticism but the main point is fair. The next show ought to be better TV.

A second line of criticism is more political. To one critic, for instance, many lines sounded like "the Cold War rhetoric of years gone by, heavy-handedly opportunistic and transparent." Perhaps so. But when you get down to it, what is the proper tone of voice in which to speak of the crushing of the Polish renewal? How much emotion is allowed in one's voice? How white-wine cool must one be? Public officials must be genuine and responsible in what they say, but they are not required to mask their feelings before an outrage. Cold War rhetoric can be overdone. But some things are worse.

1907: Unbearable Taxes

NEW YORK - Taxes in New York have come to be absolutely unbearable. Vast public improvements, necessary and commendable in themselves, though not in the extravagance of their cost in accomplishment, have so swollen the city's enormous debt that we are tremendously taxed to keep up the interest alone. Added to all this is the annual budget for maintenance of local departments. As a result, life in New York is excessively expensive for poor and rich, and the tax gatherers' demands are so onerous that tens of thousands of people are driven annually to the suburbs to escape them, and nearby towns and villages are being rapidly built up by people who have been taxed out of New York.

1932: N.Y. Pistol Law

ALBANY, N.Y. - At a hearing on bills to amend the pistol permit law, Edward P. Mulrooney, police commissioner of New York City, argued against removing from the law the provisions requiring the fingerprinting and photographing of applicants for licenses to possess and carry pistols. "We must have some regulation to keep the guns away from criminals, or at least prevent them from waving firearms under our noses," he said. The majority members of the comittee, however, indicated their intention of reporting favorably on the Esmond bill, which removes the requirement for fingerprinting and photographing for permits issued in counties outside New

America's New Huddled Masses, the Haitians

By Flora Lewis

MIAMI — The exodus of desperate Haitians to southern Florida has raised hackles, fears and some decent sympathies. So many gripping issues are entangled that there is a tendency for outrage to narrow into lines that never meet. That can't ease matters, let alone produce solutions.

There is, in fact, a dilemma that neither the Coast Guard, the Immigration Service, liberal indignation, xenophobia nor economic and social resentment can handle on their own.

Here is a glaring case where the idea of "new federalism" directly confronts basic national interests in many ways, including foreign poli-cy, protection of constitutional rights, humane ues and the understandable irritation of a relatively small community forced to bear the burden of a problem stemming from the United States' role in the world.

In Haiti, the New York Times correspondent Jo Thomas has reported, "Miami" means all the U.S.A., land of opportunity, the only escape. It isn't really the United States' fault that things are so bad in the hemisphere's second oldest republic. But the United States cannot and does not want to change the fact that it is the best-off country and thus an inevitable magnet for miserable neighbors. There is no way to move out of the North American neighborhood, as there was a way, however painful, to move out of Southeast Asia. So the fact of attraction has to be faced, along with the republic's historic pride in accepting "your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free," as Miss Liberty proclaims in New York's harbor.

The Rengan administration has seized on

The Reagan administration has seized on the test of political asylum as a way of sorting out who can stay. Given U.S. tradition, it is an arbitrary filter to provide an excuse for limiting the numbers of Haitians accepted and selecting the better educated.

The attempts to apply the test have led not only to anomalies but to procedures that threaten the supremacy of constitutional magnetic or due process; a danger to efficient guarantees on due process, a danger to citizens as well as aliens. A 38-year-old lawyer on the staff of the Justice Department, Richard Allen Marshall Jr., recently quit his job in Miami because, he said, he could no longer in conscience defend the government's position.

Besides, as Marshall and many other troubled Floridians point out, however hard it may be to define the difference between a solition.

be to define the difference between a political refugee and a person simply seeking a better chance to work and survive, the test isn't being applied with common fairness. Why is it taken so much for granted, they ask, that Cubans, Vietnamese, and now Poles meet that measure but Haitians probably don't? Does political asylum apply to people from Communist states but not to those fleeing equally if not more repressive dictatorships?

An easy conclusion is that discrimination against Haitians represents endemic racism. That may be a factor, but it clearly is not the

For one thing, there is a last-straw element in the hostility to Haitian migration into Miami. The area has absorbed more than 100,000 Cubans who streamed in from Mariel in a period of three months, putting a tremendous strain on public services and established community relations. A sharp rise in the crime rate aggravated tensions, though it is easing now, and in any case it is generally accepted that serious crime in Miami is almost all drug-relat-ed and has little to do with refugees.

Less openly expressed, but obviously im-portant, are the cultural and social difficulties presented by the Haitians. Older migration waves brought urban dwellers with some knowledge of at least the rudiments of modern society. Current arrivals tend to be unskilled society. Current arrivals tend to be unskuled illiterates, speaking a language, Creole, that scarcely anyone else knows.

A country big enough and adaptable enough to settle large numbers of Vietnamese could cope with these people, now estimated at 60,000 in the United States. But the Miami area's population of 1.7 million, nearly double that of a generation ago hells at being sadthat of a generation ago, balks at being sad-dled with the whole responsibility.

So the immigration service packs Haitian migrants into a detention center where normal standards of justice aren't being applied, and the Coast Guard tries to intercept new arrivals at the cost sometimes of their lives. Every part of the operation has some justification, and every part of it is in a way disgraceful. This is a national problem, Miami's only because it is the nearest U.S. city to Haiti, and it requires a national decision on refugees that can't be evaded by legalisms about who is and who is not "political."

And it is a long-term problem of how to live next door to desperation. We can try to build cruel and costly barriers, undermining our own standards, but we can't ignore it.

The unlimited immigration of the United States' first century and a half is no longer realistic. Now the country cannot avoid some responsibility for helping people nearby make life tolerable in their own homes, if Americans want to avoid the shameful dilemma Miami is having to face.

News-Propaganda Dispute Only Hurts VOA

TATASHINGTON - Parties to V the ancient and running dispute at the Voice of America about news vs. propaganda should worry less about theory and more about practice. Purists on both sides can continue indulging their conceits and mutual suspicions only at the expense of the high rank in international broadcasting that the VOA, which is 40 years old this month, has earned with hard work. Despite the reported fading of last fall's strongly propagandist ideas at the VOA, the old antagonism survives. It flares visibly when U.S.-Soviet relations chill, when crises sharpen administra-tions' perceptions of the Voice as a foreign policy instrument, when seeming imperatives of ideology loom. At such times, expanding the VOA's propaganda dimension has powerful appeal for some; for others it signals a subtle assault on the Voice's news.

Potentially far worse, though, are some ideas on the propaganda side. There, those who would call more attention to Soviet wrongdoing probably have a useful idea. Yet merely filling the airways with negative barping is dull stuff. Radio Moscow proves it daily, dis-crediting its other programming and limiting its real penetration to the unsophisticated — a word that these days fits ever fewer listeners: Three things remain clear. First, the integrity of its news is the key to the Voice of America's success. Second, each administration has title to use the government's radio station to present and explain its foreign policy ideas and actions. Third, applying these truths can-not ignore what is most important of all: the overseas audience.

As listeners, most of these consumers couldn't care less about theories back in Washington. While they would be turned off if the VOA became sharply and in-creasingly ham-handed and official few think that it is anything other than a government en-terprise; they understand why governments mount radio broadcast operations That helps explain why the Voice has the largest foreign radio audience in the Soviet Union, China and Latin America. If being on the level is funda-mental to the Voice's broadcasting, how can the present management strengthen propaganda, as it wants to do, without sacrificing listeners in Peking, São Paulo and Moscow?

First, focus the energies of the old dispute on the nature and use of propaganda: the U.S. message, the official U.S. line. News may attract listeners, but the message is basically why VOA is on the air. At the moment, listeners know that they can get the U.S. line without being clobbered.

Second, leave the news alone. The Voice's new leaders say they intend to do just that, but some critics remain unconvinced. Con-vince them. Make it clear that news can't be improved, changed or otherwise tampered with, that its integrity and relevance to listeners' interests is a permanent, truly

France's Plan for 'Gallic Miracle' in Industry

WASHINGTON — While Japan sets the world's pace for industrial growth, France — heretofore a modest performer in manufacturing competition — is nimbly moving along with ambitious and well-financed plans for a Gallic version of the "Japanese miracle."

The drive didn't begin with the Mitterrand government, but is rapidly accelerating under it. The main difference now is a big increase in both money and sense of marketplace reality. High-tech grandeur, symbolized by the financially disastrous Concorde supersonic transport, is out and profit-seeking is in.

In the latest move, government spending on research and developm is going up, in one giant step, by almost 30 percent, with the aim of surpassing the United States in three or four years in percentage of national wealth devoted to this area. The minister of research and technology. Jean-Pierre Chevenement — a fast-rising politician whose ministry has been gobbling up agencies from other parts of government speaks confidently of matching IBM's research budget. A key part of his program for breaking into foreign electronics markets is a newly annonneed, lavishly financed research center to be led by superstars of research imported from U.S. universities and industry. Chevenement says, with Mitterrand's endorsement, "Science is a passion and France

Meanwhile, with the U.S. space shuttle laboring through a difficult delay-laden shakedown, the European Space Ageny's Ariane rocket has come into service as a full-fledged competitor for satellite launching business. A European-assisted outgrowth of France's intercontinental missile program, Ariane is the United States' only major competitor for the 200 or so weather, communications and research satellites that non-Communist nations plan to put into orbit between 1983 and 1990. Ariane's sales organization says it already has $425 million worth of launch contracts - 40 percent of them from outside European Economic Com-

In big commercial aircraft, too, the French-led Airbus Industric consortium provides serious competition for the United States, for many years the only producer in the Western world. With headquarters and assembly lines in France, the multination European firm is raising production of its increasingly popular wide-body A-300s and A-310s from the present 4.2 aircraft a month to eight. The increase will be taking effect as Lockheed terminates production of the L-1011, a major competition for the European-made craft.

While it is now routine for political leaders of industrialized nations to speak kindly of research, it is also common for their support to stop short of sustained financial and political backing. The Mitterrand government, with its clearsighted view of how nations can earn their way in an era of high-technology industrial competition, has been giving the most solemn assurances of the durability of its commitment. In regard to trained manpower, the indispensable ingredient of scientific and techno-logical prowess, funds for university science are being increased, and job openings in government laboratories are being created at a rate of almost

The French pattern contrasts sharply with what is happening in the United States, where a once-buoyant research enterprise is trying to adapt to a patchwork of static budgets and severe cuts. There's no sign so far of industrial research benefiting from newly enacted tax incentives. And, with universities facing further reductions in graduate-student support, the financial underpinnings for scientific and technical training are seriously threatened.

President Reagan's science adviser, George A. Keyworth, has been urging his scientific colleagues to come to terms with the need for austerity by ending research programs that are low in scientific excellence or societal relevance. Overall, he insists, national spending for research would be ample — if the money were better applied. So far, however, he's been talking in the wilderness. Policy-making for U.S. science is adrift, in direct contrast to the optimistic, purposeful and well-financed effort under way in France.

Lebanon: Warnings By Israel

By Philip Geyelin

WASHINGTON — A delegathe National Religious Broadcasters, a mostly evangelical church organization that includes followers of Jerry Falwell and Billy Graham, dropped by the Israeli Embassy the other day for a briefing. It included a special performance by Rosina Fernhoff, an actress from Tel Arby.

Her moving monologue, in which she plays the part of a teacher in an Israeli school seized by Palestinian terrorists, powerfully expresses the terment on both sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict, But the briefing officer had the air of a man with higher priorities. He left no doubt that he would have liked to have had more time to enlarge on Israel's immediate security concerns — one in particular.

The message he (and the Israeli government) wanted to broadcast to Americans is that the Palestine to Americans is that the ratesune Liberation Organization is in blatant violation of the cease-fire across the Israeli-Lebanese frontier—a cease-fire that was engineered last summer through the good offices of U.S. special envoy Philip Tablic A forcy of news reports Habib. A flurry of news reports originating from Israel have begun to hammer at the same point.

What is at work here, quite obvi-ously, is an orchestrated campaign to engage American understanding and support if the gung-ho Israeli military establishment prevails and Prime Minister Menachem Begin agrees to a full-scale Israeli invasion to crush the rapidly expanding PLO military forces in southem Lebanon.

It is never easy, in these matters, to distinguish warnings issued for deterrence's sake from signals of flat-out intent. My guess is that in this case the distinction isn't worth making. The current Lebanes scene is quite sufficiently incendiary to serve as a hair-raising reminder of how little it could take in the absence of a serious and credible peace process, to spark from one side or the other a resort to violent measures.

Tank Strength

The Israelis have amassed a heavy concentration of forces just south of the Lebanese border. At the embassy in Washington, officials are quick to produce persuasive intelligence reports on the degree to which the PLO has exploited the cease-fire to expand its striking power.

By Israeli reckoning, since last summer the PLO in Lebanon has received 1,000 tons of military equipment directly from the Soviet Union, 200 tons from Saudi Arabia and 100 tons from Libya, including ground-to-air missiles. The number of ground-to-ground missiles purportedly has more than doubled; tank strength has grown from 34 to 70 and been upgraded to more powerful models.

The Israelis claim that the PLO has been end-running the Lebanese cease-fire with 14 infiltration attempts into Israel from Jordan, at a cost of seven Israelis killed and 49 wounded. About 29 terrorist incidents aimed at Israelis in third countries have taken nine

We regard all this as violations of the cease-fire," said an Israeli okesman. He quickly added that it does "not yet" constitute the "clear provocation" Begin has spoken of in defining what it would take to trigger an Israeli plunge into Lebanon. But the emphasis is on "not yet." As last year's Israeli move on Golan and Israel's bombings of Baghdad and Beirut would suggest, it would be unwise to count on just when a PLO "provocation" might become "clear" to Menachem Begin.

Torn by Dissent

The PLO, for its part, is torn by dissent between fanatic and moderate factions, not necessarily sub-ject to anybody's restraining hand for any predictable period of time. With all this presumably in mind, the Reagan administration is sending Habib back to the scene. His presence is a proven pacifier. It may be enough to damp things down until the deadline that is at the center of concern: April 25, when Israel is scheduled to complete its withdrawal from the Sinai and the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty comes into full force.

But if that's the extent of the Habib mission, how does the Reagan administration propose to keep the Middle East peace after April 25? What's left of Camp David doesn't meet the need. The choice of an amiable, but unknown and unknowledgeable U.S. special negotiator for the Palestinian "autonomy" talks scarcely lends weight or urgency to the proceedings. Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger's dabbling in security arrangements with Saudi Arabia can only serve to add to Issael's sense of U.S. indifference. rael's sense of U.S. indifference.

What looms ahead is a U.S. policy void — a nothingness of the sort that historically has given free play to violent, unilateral acts. Lebanon is the likeliest ignition point.

The Synergistic Partnership of Food and Wine

by Patricia Wells

ARIS - While there are no rigid rules concerning the harmony of food and wine, it's pure folly to ignore what nature itself has made possible. Natural marriages exist between wine or alcohol and certain foods since, as agricultural products, they share the same soil, geography, culture, and are often products of the same hands.

Foie gras has a natural affinity for Sauternes, raw terring is enriched by a good Dutch gin or a Scandinavian aquavit, and nothing goes so well with choucroute as a good, honest lager.

Hearty peasant fare, such as cassoulet, calls for hearty, peasant wine, like Cahors or Madiran, while an exalted wine like a vintage port might better be saved for a dense and supple

The acquisition of certain grand bottles call for planning a meal around the wine, rather than the reverse If an old Barolo or Gattinara comes your way, save it for a proper roast beef or game preparation. A great St. Emilion or Pomerol should not be overwhelmed by anything complicated: Stick to a good steak, a solid roast beef or a varied cheese platter.

For the same reason that a silk dress and jogging shoes are totally inharmonious, one wouldn't wash down a pizza with an aged Burgundy, or a perfect roast pigeon with a glass of sweetened ice tea.

Matching wine to food at home is one mat-ter. Only the budget and one's knowledge of the two are to be considered. Restaurants are another story. At times, the obstacles are so great, one is tempted to give in, allowing the sommelier to prder for you or settling into the house-wine syndrome.

Why is it that the maitre d'botel rarely argues with a diner, while the sommelier feels obliged to put up a fight? (Are so born with special combat genes?) Note the following recent experiences: Several months ago, during a dinner at L'Archestrate in Paris, the sommelier all but refused to serve us the wine we had selected: a perfectly decent, moderately priced Bordeaux. Finally, out of exhaustion and hunger, we compromised, settling for one wine of our choice, one of his Later, when we indicated we did not think much of his selection, the sommelier stalked off and salked for 20 minutes while we sat with empty glasses.

At Gerard Pangaud, in the Paris suburb of Boulogne-Billancourt, a single wine list circu-lates about the rather large dining room. One can easily wait half an hour to get a glimpse of hovers about, hurrying you along in your selec-tion. During the last visit here, the first course came before the wine ever showed up, a practice that hardly makes for pleasant dining.

Equally annoying is the wine that exists only on paper. You order a wine and before the cave has been consulted, you are told: "We don't have it." Are they really out, or is the wine being held for special clients?

In defense of sommeliers: In attempting to convince diners to change an order, they rarely suggest a higher-priced wine. In some instances, wise advice can lead diners to discover less known and/or less expensive wines that are passed up simply out of ignorance.

Recently, wine writer Jon Winroth and I set out to sample four moderately priced Paris restaurants with wine lists better than average in price and selection. We had several purposes.

While we intended to examine cost in making the second of While we intended to examine certain traditional wine and food marriages, we also hoped to come across some less obvious combinations. We were looking as well to sample some lesser-known wines and discover some bargains in the process.

At each restaurant, we examined the wine list and menu at the same time, a practice I follow whenever possible. To stay within reasonable budget limitations, we decided to ignore any bottle priced at more than 200 francs. no matter how good, how well-priced, or how well it might go with a certain dish.

As it turned out, of the 14 wines we sampled at the four restaurants, prices per bottle ranged from 36 to 165 francs, with the average being 88 francs, or $15, not much more than the price of many house wines

We did not set out to follow the general rule of thumb concerning restaurant bills, which is to spend one-third of the total on wine, twothirds on food. As it turned out, our bills were closer to 50-50, because we sampled more wines than one might normally.

Some findings were obvious, such as the combination of Au Trou Gascon's sublime cassoulet - a blend of white beans and bomemade sausage, mutton, pork and gésier confit, fresh tomatoes and confit de canard — and the honestly priced Corbieres (36 francs), the vigorous red of the Midi. The cassoulet and the Corbières are both frank and forward. and of equal strength.

At the Trou Gascon, we were also reminded that it's a waste of money and good wine to combine a dish such as cassoulet with a finer, more delicate wine. A 1970 Chateau Petit-Village (165 francs), powerful in its own right, was a perfect match for chef Alain Dutournier's magret de canard, but tasted ridiculous with the cassouler. Not surprisingly the Pomerol and the magret de canard - pan fried and sauced with a fumet de mousserons, or superb wild mushroom stock — were on the same wavelength, subtle, elegant and refined.

At Le Coq de la Maison Blanche we ordered a 1967 Chateau La Croix (120 francs) to go with the special coq au vin (here prepared with with the special coq au vin (here prepared with a good old, honest, curmudgeony coq), aware that we weren't going to find a wine of that age, quality and price every day. The combination was classic, and the tough, mature Pomerol was equally delicious with le bouribout de canard, a spicy duck stew that resembles coq

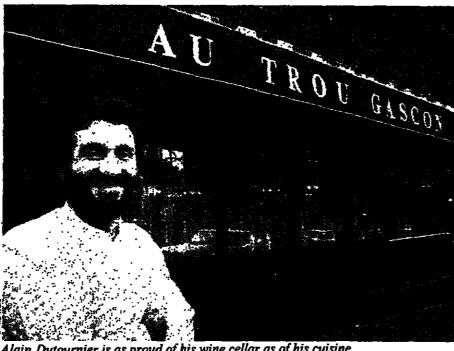

Following the same reasoning, at A Sousceyrac, it made perfect sense to combine a gi-ant, pistachio-studded saucisson de Lyon with a solid 1979 Cahors (45 francs) from Charles

As pleasant as all these combinations were it was more fun, and challenging to search out less obvious pairings. Just as some foods in-stantly bring to mind a certain wine, others leave most of us groping for harmony. Fresh salmon calls for a good white Burgundy or

Other less obvious combinations included a 1978 Montagny (72 francs), a dry white Burgundy, served with saumon poele and Belgian endive, and a 1979 Gigondas (90 francs), a strong, full-bodied Rhone Valley red served with a game platter that included grouse, pheasant and fresh whole chestnuts. Game calls for a forceful wine, and although Morot-Gaudry suggested a 1976 Chateau de Glana St. Julien (115 francs) to accompany the grouse and pheasant, the Bordeaux couldn't stand up.

At Le Coq de la Maison Blanche, other inexpensive wines also proved to be versatile good mates. Another Loire Valley white, 1980 Menétou-Salon (45 francs) served as a good maich to both a salade de ris de veau with walnuts and a platter of parsleyed, garlicky escargots. Confronted with a vinegar dressing, as in the sweethread salad, one might normally forgo the wine. But in this case the absorbent ris de veau did much to cut the acidity of the vinegar and the little Ménétou-Salon stood up well to the rich sweetbread and walnut combina-

The snail and Ménétou-Salon combination

Alain Dutournier is as proud of his wine cellar as of his cuisine.

California chardonnay, but what about a salad of marinated salmon covered with a thick layer of fresh truffle shavings? We selected a 1978 Meursault Perrières (145 francs) and hit it on the nose. Not just perfect harmony, but discovery of a new taste sensation. When a sip of the smooth, golden and powerful Meursault followed a hite of the salmon and truffles, the wine quickly heightened the intensity of the food. For the next 30 seconds, flavors seemed to appear and disappear, dance around, until, finally, the palate was filled with a single, wonderful flavor, dominated but not overwhelmed Equally pleasurable were combinations selected by Jean-Pierre Morot-Gaudry. At Morot-Gaudry, diners may select a menu degustation that includes a different glass of wine selected for its compatibility with each of the various courses. Here, instead of the traditional foie gras and Sauternes, we sampled a 1976 Quarts de Chaume (118 francs), an intense and golden Loire valley wine that is just as satisfying as a Sauternes, though somewhat lighter and less alcoholic.

was a pleasant surprise, for the Loire Valley white proved powerful enough, providing an

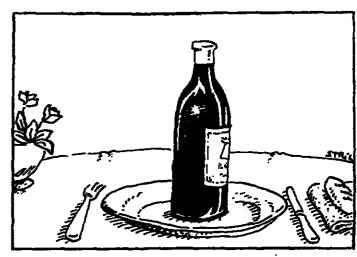

All told, of the 14 wines sampled, it was the less expensive, less well-known wines that provided the most pleasure. Much of it had to do with the simplicity and the hearty nature of the foods selected, but more than that, it had to do with the wines - first their production, then the wise selection of the various restaurateurs.

ARIS - Wine is often thought of as a mere adjunct to food, rather than as the integral part of a meal it becomes in countries such as France and Italy. Yet even in France making a perfect match between the wine and the food is no easy mat-

First of all, most wine lists are, to put it bluntly, lousy. They are full of nothing but the predictable shippers' boring company-style wines where the Burgundy tastes like the Beaujolais and you might mistake the Bordeaux for

At the restaurants where food writer Patricia Wells and I decided to tackle this problem, the owners take as much interest in their cellars as in their kitchens. All of them buy many of their wines directly from the grower during regular vineyard trips and they taste every wine before adding it to their lists.

But the restaurants varied considerably in type and style of cooking. All shared the dis-tinction of a Michelin star and reasonable prices for the quality. Le Coq de la Maison Blanche is large, serving hearty bistro fare to as many as 200 customers a day, mostly at lunch. A Sousceyrac is far smaller and goes in for rich sauces and solid dishes from southwest France. Au Trou Gascon shares the southwest emphasis in a highly original nouvelle cuisine style. Morot-Gaudry also offers elegant nouvelle cuisine

All have large well-stocked cellars, but the oice is restricted to about 80 wines at both Le Coq and A Sousceyrac, while Au Trou Gas-con with 335 wines and Morot-Gaudry with 530 have two of the widest selections available in Paris. Although impressive, such vast lists tend to leave one gasping for breath and wondering where to start. Just going through them can consume half an hour and even then all but the most knowledgeable and tenacious are likely to give up and turn the problem over to the sommelier, not always a happy solution.

We chose most of our own wines after lengthy consideration of the last two lists but in consultation with the owner or his sommelier. At the Trou Gascon we picked our wines first, then matched the food to the wine. At Morot-Gaudry there is a menu degustation at 230 francs that includes a different glass of wine for each course, a very pleasant way out of the thicket of 530 wines, at least for a first

But such pre-organized matches are rare and good sommeliers even rarer. So how did we go about selecting our wines in the other three? Obviously, we looked for the bargains within our voluntary 200-franc limit. Some were stunning in quality at the price and plenty of others were available.

The first thing is just to look at the low-priced wines of whatever category. We tried the 1981 Beaujolais-Villages (39 francs) at Le Coq because the owner was proud of having selected it at the grower's (Gérani Martin at Leynes) before it pulled down the first prize at the Villefranche wine judging. It was almost unbelievably fruity, and we drank it with a mousseline de brochet (pike mousse) in a rich sauce Nantua. Despite being a red wine it was a perfect match because Beaujolais is not a tannic wine and this one was so fruity.

Other wines remain inexpensive because they are little-known. Loire Valley 1980 Ménétou-Salon (45 francs at Le Coq) is a bargain stand-in for more expensive Sancerre and is made from the same white sauvignon grape, as is the 1979 Château Launay (34 francs), from Bordeaux's Entre-Deux-Mers region.

Another approach to bargains is to look for great wines in off years, such as second-ranked Château Gruaud-Larose 1972 from the Medoc. For only 72 francs at Morot-Gaudry it is a steal. To be sure it is rather light but it retains all the elegance and class of its high make great wines look like rip-offs. The 1980 Domaine de Saint-Jean de Bébian from the Hérault for 36 francs at the Trou Gascon could give his 185-franc Châteauneuf-du-Pape a run for its quality.

Nearly all of A Sousceyrac's list was far below our 200-franc limit, even the champagnes, notably Besserat de Bellefon at a mere 100 francs. On the other hand, some of the wines were not of the year listed and at least one, a 1976 Santenay-Maladière (100 francs) was substituted without notice for the listed 1972. (45 francs) because it was supposed to be from the outstanding 1975 vintage, but we were given, with due warning this time, a 1979 that was good but not memorable. There was no change in price in either case.

An important note at all four restaurants is that the producer — grower or shipper — was noted for all but the Bordeaux châteaux. Without the name of the producer it is hard to de-cide which wine to pick. Chinon is a red appe-lation d'origine contrôlée from the Loire. Much of it is just passable at best, but what a pleasure to find top grower Charles Joguet at both Morot-Gaudry and Trou Gascon. It's like running into an old friend again and is the nearest thing to an absolute assurance of reasonably priced good wine in a new restaurant.

Jackson Pollock — The Rebel Artist Who Belongs to Tradition

by Michael Gibson

ARIS — Twenty-five years after his untimely fleath at the age of 44, Jackson Pollock is well established in the public usind as "a major artist of this y." The exhibition of 63 of his paintings century under the title "Les cheis d'oeuvres de Jackson Pollock" at the Pompidon Center (to April 19) simply acknowledges this and presents these vigorous, passionate works in a refreshingly uncrowded space.

Supporting this canonization is a summary in the exhibition's catalog of 1,100 articles devoted to Pollock's work during his lifetime and since his death, some of the former describing him as a second-rate painter while the latter generally accept his art as an established value.

But why do we respond to Pollock's work in this new? Critics can call to be be the second to Pollock's work in this new? this way? Critics can call up history, psychology, aesthetic theory and other disciplines too that help explain Pollock's significance by ex-amining the artist's psyche, the social and his-torical situation of his time, the situation of American art in the 1940s and 50s, etc. The fact is, however, that there are few points in common between the process that spewed forth these works and the way we assess and use them today.

Art of this quality is a sort of freak event, a product of chance that goes against the acceptable norms of social communication of the time in which it appears. That we can today derive the same type of delight from them that we derive from a Rembrandt shows that they have, in turn, become to a degree a standard medium of social communication, that their disruptive power has, up to a point, been spent. But what we now discover is their constructive power. Because Pollock (or any artist of his stature) does not merely disrupt, he also

The show starts with some small, early paintings including a self-portrait done when Pollock was about 20. The face, marked by some white and orange highlights, emerges from an inky darkness. The eyes are unusually large, almost lemurian, and seem to express fear and determination in equal measure. We are reminded that Pollock, who subsequently had periods of hard drinking, suffered from deep conflicts that were sometimes debilitating. It is worth noting that his art, while marked by the exceptional intensity one might expect in a man struggling with such forces, has a balance of its own and cannot rightly be studied as the mirror of a psyche. The psyche is there, to be sure, but the work has achieved an independent life of its own.

Another interesting early painting, "Sea-scape" (1934), could almost be brushed aside 'as a daub. The brushstrokes appear thick and almost awkward, but if we look at it more attentively we discover an enormous expressionistic power, and we discover too that the development of an artist has the power of giv-ing truth and relevance to earlier works that would otherwise have remained the intriguing sign of a promise unfulfilled. In the early '40s Pollock, who had had occasional psychiatric treatment before, started a Jungian analysis, and a number of paintings of this period, done in an explosively expressionistic idiom (with some bits of vocabulary inherited from Picasso), appear to reflect the earnest wish to give shape to archetypal figures where his "drawings in analysis" that were not destined to be shown in an art gallery. These works are visibly weakened by the artist's submission to psychological theory in the course of therapy, but his durable lust for the materiality of pigment remains vigorously active and produces rich painterly effects.

The central part of the exhibition is naturalthe central part of the exhibition is naturally occupied by the big drippings and it might be worthwhile asking oneself why this sort of painting has appeared so relevant to our age. I can see several possible explanations, of which the least satisfactory refer to formal problems of painting and to the need that was being felt for a specifically American art.

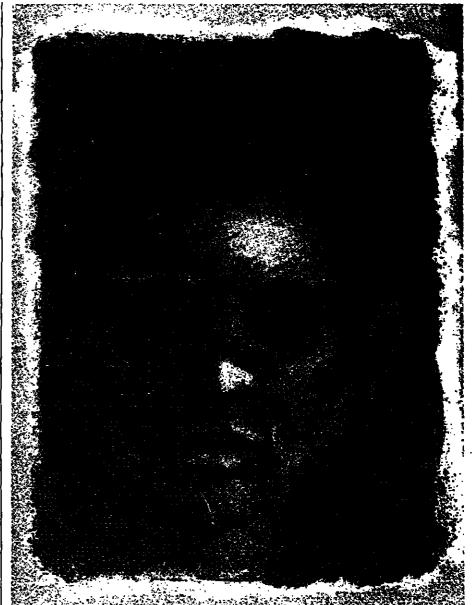

Artists in the past have always talked about both inspiration and discipline. Now inspira-tion is not a term that a pragmatic America was likely to take seriously, and even now we still live in view of things in which the contra-dictory forces at work in the world are chance and necessity. But chance and necessity, come to think of it, are not all that far removed from what is implied by inspiration and discipline.

Pollock's drip paintings are a web of pure chance, of pure physical inspiration, the result of a sort of dance the artist executed on the canvas laid out flat and in a state of, let's say, suspended consciousness. Chance is a cousin to chaos, just as necessity is related to order. Now the thing that catches the eye, and then the emotions and finally the mind in these big paintings is that the monstrous gamble with chance results in a certain visually intelligible order. Where then does the discipline he? In the rhythm of the artist's dance? In a sort of unconscious contro!?

The question is perhaps secondary, because the important thing is that these paintings make sense, that Pollock gambled and won. This is not really apparent in the reproduc-tions, and this is also a satisfying fact, because it means that the paintings preserve their sura. that the peculiar ritual executed in East Hampton by this singular man remains a singular event and that the effect will never be duplicat-

Pollock, the rebel artist, belongs to tradition, as he himself knew, precisely because of this singularity. Because the tradition of art is not the understanding of rules and the mastery of know-how that makes it possible for, say, Rembrandt's pupils to go on making more Rembrandts. The real tradition is the urge for which art is just a means, and this urge is what real artists have been serving with the devotion of their lives wherever art exists as more than mere technique.

But these paintings also suggest a curtain, something like the will that hides the figure of ultimate truth in Schiller's poem about the overweening disciple goes into the temple at night, thrusts the curtain aside and is struck dead because he was not yet ripe for the truth signified by the statue behind the veil. Pollock's paintings can be read in this sense be-cause of the vital earnestness of his work.

Self-portrait (1930-33), in dark earth colors.

fies, just as Rothko's does - a need that is mystic but nonetheless secular, simply because, as Shelley said: "The deep truth is imageless." But the business of art has always been to pursue this "deep truth" with the means at its disposal, and this pursuit was There is a mystic need that his work satis-

TIENNA — Central Europe's biggest ballet festival — Tanz '82, with 74 performances between Feb. 16 and April 4 — will show off such diverse figures of the dance world as Twyla Tharp and Karole Armitage, Pina Bausch and Reinhild Hoffmann, Jiri Kylian and John Neumeier, the Royal Danish Ballet and the Lipizzaner stallions, Hans van Manen and Glen Tetley, Béjart and Balanchine, Nureyev and the Panovs, Brigitte Stadler and Jolantha Seyfried Brigitte who? Jolantha what?

They are teen-age bullerinas - Stadler is 16 and Seyfried 17 - who joined the Vienna State Opera ballet at 14 and 15 and have come so far so fast that they have been alternating this season with Galina Panova as partner to her husband, Valery Panov, in his versions of "Petrushka" (Stravinsky) and "Sheherazade" (Rimsky-Korsakov).

Having replaced Panova — who will be 33 (their combined ages) on St. Patrick's Day — whenever she left Vienna for guest appearances, each will get a chance to dance a leading part while the festival spotlight is turned on the Panovs: Seyfried as the White Princess in "Sheherazade" on March 4, Stadler as the ballerina in "Petrushka" on March 28, while the Panovs dance together in the other half of the double bill.

Next season, they will come into their own as soloists when Stadler dances Maria in Yuri Grigorovich's version of "Nuteracker" and Seyfried is "Sleeping Beauty" in Rudolf Nureyev's choreography. While seniority is such that both are, officially, still members of the corps de ballet, "they will, in all probability, be promoted to full soloisors in the part year and a ball or two allows persistents which call is their town." next year and a half or two, almost certainly while still in their teens," says Gerhard Brunner, the State Opera ballet chief, who spotted them in the 1979 final class at the ballet school of the Austrian Federal Theaters, directed by Ludmilla Petrova. They had been going there afternoons, after school hours, from the time Seyfried was 7 and Stadler 9.

"Once we saw them," Brunner recalls, "we had to have them. They had no place to go except onward and upward, and I wanted them to do that with us. For Stadler, we had to get a special waiver from the Vienna board of education. Then, after two months in the company, seeing them work and how they developed, how they fit into the repertoire, how they behaved on the stage, how tough they were toward their own work, we recognized that they were potential soloists."

Stadler made her "Petrushka" debut last Christmas night. Critics had all covered the premiere with Panova earlier that mouth, so only one came back, but he wrote that Brunner had found a worthy replacement." On the second night of the new year, both girls danced Panova's parts. Lorin Maazel, the American conductor who becomes director of the State Opera next fall, was in the audience. "He said he was very, very proud and lucky," Brunner reports, "that he had such capital to start work with next season. Both of them are signals of a new era to come." The greening of Stadler and Seyfried and several other young dancers coincides with the graying of some of the soloists who helped Brunner transform the State Opera ballet from a weekly off-night at the opera into an exciting institution that will play 72 performances in Vienna next season and has begun touring, too. As Austrian civil servants, the dancers are entitled to full pensions after 28 years on the rolls.

Nureyev, a new Austrian citizen (his 44th birthday is also on St. Patrick's Day), will dance with Cech in his own versions of "Sleeping Beauty" on March 27 and April 2 and 3 and "Swan Lake" on March 31 as well as appearing in Tedey's "Pierrot Lunaire" (Schoenberg) and Béjart's "Songs of a Wayfarer" (Mahler) on March 26 and 29.

The festival focal point for February, however, is the Theater an der Wien, as base for the guest troupes, most of them in Vienna for the first time. The Royal Danish Ballet does Bournonville's "Kermesse in Bruges" and the third act of "Napoli" on Tuesday and Wednesday, Alvin Alley's "Memoria" and Tetley's "Voluntaries" on Thursday and Friday, and two performances of Bournonville's "La Sylphide" Feb. 20.

The Twyla Tharp Dance Foundation will give three performances of two different programs Feb. 22-24, as will Bausch's Wuppertal Dance Theater on Feb. 26-28 and Kylian's Netherlands Dance Theater on March 1-3. Then the scene shifts to nine different places around town:

• The Hofburg, where, on March 4 and 11, the Lipizzaner stallions of the Spanish Riding School will recreate a historic horse ballet of the baroque era, similar to one led in 1743 by Empress Maria Theresa herself. Eight male and eight female riders will participate in this 25-minute spectacle. Since the Spanish riders (the name comes from the style of riding) haven't been co-educational since 1894, the ancient ladies' saddles had to be sent to London for restoration.

• Two legitimate theaters: the Komödianten, where the local avantgarde Tanzforum Wien will perform an experimental program of ballets by Liz King and Andrea Campianu on March 5-7, and the Schauspielhaus for a "new dance" series March 10-16, starting with a lecture by the U.S. critic Marcia B. Siegel; performances are by Dana Reitz, Bill T. Jones and Arnie Zane, Karole Armitage (the Canadian sensation in New York), Elke Koma, the Bremen expressionist Reinhild Hoffmann, Charles Moulton and Company, and Molissa Fenley and Dancers.

 The Austrian Film Museum in the Albertina, where Siegel will pres ent a six-film program on post-modern dance between March 18 and 24.

Otto Wagner's "Church in the Madhouse" (Kirche-am-Steinhof) a Jugendshi masterpiece with Byzantine overtones. Built between 1904 and 1907, it was denounced by a member of the Austrian parliament of that time as more like "the tomb of a maharaja" than a fitting place of worship. Which is why it dawned on Brunner as "an uphill Taj Mahal where we could do three different programs of classic Indian temple dances that too often get lost when their religious and sacred roots are transplanted to a theater background." Three different styles will be performed on successive weekends.

performed on successive weekends.

• Three different places between March 18 and 24 for performance art shows ("The body of the artist as material for the sculptor").

Back at the State Opera, besides the Nureyev and Panov ballets and performances, the resident company will dance George Balanchine's "La Valse" and "Four Temperaments" (with van Manen's "Twilight" and "Five Tangos" on March 9) and his "Liebeslieder Walzer" on March 26 and 29 programs, and Neumeier's "Josephslegende" with Donna Wood and Kevin Haigen on March 25 and 30.

and Kevin Haigen on March 25 and 30. Tanz '82, two years in the planning, hopes to become a biennial event. The aim of the festival was "to show the Viennese, with their growing interest in dance, what is going on in the rest of the world," but Brunner — who cooked it up with city funding — says it was also designed "to show the rest of the dance world our particular contribution."

Carnival in Venice, alla Napoletana

by Melton S. Davis

ENICE — Once again. Venice is stag-ing its reborn carnival, and from Feb. 18 to 23, the festivities will spread through the narrow calli that are Venice's streets, along the eanals, in the open spaces scattered like stage sets through the city, and finally, into its theaters and auditoriums.

Carnival — the pre-Lenten period of revelry celebrated mainly in Roman Catholic countries - was revived in Venice on private initiative in 1979, after a lapse of decades, with mild success. The following year, the Biennale (which stages the Venice Film Festival and the famous art show) contributed its theater section, headed by stage director Maurizio Sca-parro. In 1980, tens of thousands of young people came to Venice; the result was a movable Woodstock, a setting for spontaneous happenings, joyous confusion, grotesque masks and extravagant costumes. It was even better in 1981, attended by almost half a million person and of the confusion of the confusion was and confusion to the confusion of th lion people, young and old.

By then, the theater was a confirmed participant, a reminder that the carnival period was historically one of the high points of Italian theater seasons. Its inclusion meant that there was a continuous feast for eye and ear. But the was a commons reast for eye and ear. But the open-air festivities often overshadowed the theater being given indoors. To even things up, Scaparro, who had brought in foreign companies to make the event international, has made the theme of this year's theater festival "Naples at Venice." Thus the two mainsprings of Italian theater are being honored, with Neapolitan vitality and wit presented against Neapolitan vitality and wit presented against the background of Venice, one of the first cities in Europe to have public theaters. ies in Europe to have public theaters.

Italian companies, mainly from Naples, are presenting their best offerings. At the baroque Goldoni Theater, (reopened in 1979 after 32 years of disuse) the piece de resistance is "Harlequin and the Others," staged by the renowned Piccolo Teatro of Milan. Roberto de Simone, a musicologist who delves into Naples' past for his themes, is doing "Edentheater." Italy's foremost theater personality. Eduardo de Filippo, directs his son sonality, Eduardo de Filippo, directs his son Luca in one of his own famous roles, "Always Tell Them Yes." Little theater groups from the southern city, mainly "post-avantgarde," are presenting five world premieres at the Scuola Grande di San Giovanni Evangelista, among them "Glacial Tango," by Naples' False Movement Company, in collaboration with Amsterdam's Mickery Theater.

For those who can't understand the Neapolitan dialect, and that includes many Italians, the eloquent gestures of the actors tell virtually everything that's going on. Recalling Mozart's residence in Venice, the Teatro La Fenice is striking out on its own with a program that includes "The Abduction From the Seraglio," in the La Scala production, and the unfinished "Zaide," with a new text by the Italian author Italo Calvino, staged by English director Graham Vick in the courtyard of the Palazzo Grassi. In addition, carnivalgoers can see "The Mad Little Table," a dance performed by mimes of the Piccolo Teatro of Milan to Mozart's music for a string Ballet hasn't been overlooked. The Malibran Theater is giving Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" with ballerina Elisabetta Terabust. Then there's recognition of Italy's burgeoning transvestite theater: the talented Neapolitan, Leopoldo Mastelloni, mime-actor-director, presents for the first time "Tamurriata Blu" "The Blue Tarantella") and Alfredo Cohen, although from the Abbruzzi, not Naples, has his own world premiere, "The White Dove Hotel," both at the Teatro del Ridotto.

Recitals and concerts include appearances by other well-known Neapolitan artists, espe-cially singer Roberto Murolo and actress Angela Luce. Besides, there is a theater laboratory and photography exhibits, while students of a Neapolitan high school, guests of a high school in Venice, put on theatrical images adapted from Curzio Malaparte's "The Skin," about the U.S. Army occupation of Naples.

An added fillip to theatergoing is to see the audience in costumes and masks. This isn't required, but in one where masks are needed to enter, spectators are then served orangeade or

In addition, the city is trying to make it easy to get around. In some of the calli that in the past have been jammed with people, one-way pedestrian traffic is the rule. And municipal authorities have made a real effort to keep prices down in the city's 700 bars and restaurants during carnival. Besides, the city-run cafeteria behind Piazza San Marco is again offering low-cost meals. And carnival season tickets for the vaporetti, the city's aquatic buses, are

This doesn't mean that everyone won't crowd into Piazza San Marco, particularly the night of Mardi Gras, when the exuberant chaos reaches its height. Although open-air festivi-ties take place in settings that haven't changed since the 1700s, San March is the epicenter of the carnival. Through it pass Fellinian cardinals, Indian princes, angels, wizards and witches, monks and devil, nuns and courtesans, and this year in honor of Naples, punchinellos. Visitors can join the crowd thronging through the piazza and weaving in and out of the arcades, or just sit at one of the cafes and watch the spider's web of dancing celebrants. Here music is played throughout the day and most of the night. In 1981, the rain came down by the bucketful, but tens of thousands danced under the rain with colored umbrellas or in raincoats.

Nor do strikes hold up the lun. Last year, when the boats stopped running, visitors hap-pily discovered unknown parts of the city while walking to their destinations. In any event, get a map. Venetians have a genial habit of answering inquiries about directions with a well-meaning, "Straight ahead." Given Venice's unique topography, it's best to rise early and get oriented.

Despite the crowds that carnival attracts.

Venice's chief of police says that with the city no longer deserted in the evenings, the crime rate in this period becomes almost nonexistent. Visitors can expect to see all the trappings of recent carnivals: a regatta with masked oarsmen, a parade of elaborate floats, a calvacade of singing gondoliers (in gondolas, naturally) masked balls and impromptu concerts, improvised clowning and gifted mimes seemingly everywhere. In the evening, the city's monuments are illuminated, there's dancing in the squares of the city, processions in costume through the streets and along the canals, children's fancy dress parades, and of course, op-era, musical comedies and plays in the joyfully from the Cavaly Series."

Visiting China on an Ego Trip

by Richard F.Shepard

ONG KONG — The Western tourist arrives in China with the sincerest intention of indulging in some frantic China-watching — only to find upon arrival that one of the national pastimes of the natives is watching him. Wherever the tourist goes - particularly if he goes in batches, as most tourists do in China - he plays to full houses of Chinese who ponder the improbable speciacle of this outlander, with camera, odd hairdo and funny-cut costume (which, moreover, fails to match that of any other fellow tourist.)

The tourist as spectacle is a free entertainment for those being toured. The reactions to this traveling show range from mild timidity to high amusement, but there is always an element of curiosity and often friend-ship — not intimate buddyship, but warm cordiality. And sometimes the effect can be stunning. In Shanghai, a man on a bicycle wheeled off course for a good look at us. He stared back over his shoulder at us after he had passed. When he neath hit a starching and fell off his hike we he had passed. When he nearly hit a stanchion and fell off his bike, we felt like comedians who had 'em rolling on the floor with our act.

At Xian's hot springs, hundreds of Chinese visitors stopped dead in their tracks to look at us. Chinese look hard and openly at tourists. They may not look hard at pretty women, a practice frowned upon in China, but the tourist is open game. Here were lovely gardens, fine trees and beautiful scenery, yet everyone was taking time out to give us the eye. I whipped my camera out and pointed it. Some of the starers seemed upset, although most took it in good part. I said, in my flawlessly broken Chinese, "You look at us, we look at you, OK, OK?"

More laughter and good nature, with even the frozen faces thawing. What passes among Westerners as impassivity or even hostility in Chinese expression tends to disappear as soon as the visitor manifests

At the start of a Chinese journey, this sense of being the center of attention is somewhat disconcerting. After all, nobody except those with something to sell bothers to give you a second glance in San Francisco, London, Puerto Rico, Rome, London or Jerusalem. But in China when you and your fellows come out of the bus you feel as though you are a circus come to town.

When my wife and I went, with a friend fluent in the language, to a when my wile and I went, with a friend finent in the language, to a Peking department store — not the tourist-preserve one but one for the general public — people dropped what they were doing and rushed over to see what we were up to. My wife is a shopper conscientious to the point of my utter distraction — if we had not been in China, where I was eager to see how others shop, I would have taken up my usual position, reading the newspaper at the entrance. reading the newspaper at the entrance.

My wife stopped at a counter where shopping bags, made of cord, were on sale. As she studied the various designs, waited on by the six clerks who found this new clientele irresistible, men, women and children formed a shield around us. They discussed my wife's taste and wondered which bag she would purchase. When she finally bought six of one design as gifts, four onlookers bought the same kind; had I known more Chinese, I would have broached the idea of making expenses by having her shill at department stores from Lhasa to Harbin.

But she was already at a counter where sweaters were for sale. She wanted to try one on for size but the clerk said there was no way to do it. Our Chinese Greek chorus behind us said, "Let her try it on," and the clerks did. We asked some of the ladies whether they liked it. They did,

After the initial embarrassment passes, this sort of experience does wonders for the ego. One soon comes to expect to be the cynosure of all eyes, an amiable freak whose attention is courted and whose words, even when they are not understood, are respectfully listened to. In Hangzhou, we attended a variety show given by visiting movie stars; we reveled in being gaped at on arrival, but stole away at the half when the film stars upstaged us.

Oh, it was not all sunshine but we were never approached for money or presents, although an English-speaking young fellow would occasionally tag along to tell us about a teacher he had who lived in Great Neck, N.Y., or to ask us how he could get to study in the United States. , or to ask us how he could get to study in the United States.

In restaurants we were seated in private enclaves or screened off from other diners, but Chinese nonetheless came to peer at us — fascinated, doubtless, at the sight of Westerners trying to get food from plate to mouth with chopsticks. At such moments, I could almost always be relied on to drop a mushroom in my lap. It was the least I could do for neone who had left a table to come and view us.

By the time we entrained for Hong Kong from Canton, we had become used to being leisure-time entertainment for the masses. We were even flattered by the attention. I had grown used to patting children on the head, shaking hands with strangers and gabbing about American-Chinese friendship. Another two weeks and I would have run for office.

This strange world of the tourist crumbled, as tourist worlds always do, when we crossed the Hong Kong line. No sooner had we entered the streets of the Crown Colony than we realized that nobody looked at us at all. Hong Kong's Chinese are cosmopolitans and busy people. They do not stare and they did not care what we thought about the affairs of the world. We had left China and were brought back down to earth, mere mortals among mere mortals.

It had come to be a good feeling, this business of being a star in the Chinese firmament, and we missed it. There are probably few other places where you can attract precisely the same sort of attention merely because von are von.

Of course, one can always wait until next year and try somewhere else. Spitzbergen? Maybe Kamchatka? They may not have yet experienced the likes of you and me.

Whimsy in the Auction House

by Souren Melikian

ARIS -- What makes Droug, the Pars auction house, such a special treat for collectors who know their business and have time enough to drop in every day is the strong touch of whimsy.

First, you never know what may turn up. A printed catalog with numbered lots should not be treated as limitative. Additional items hors catalogue, as unlisted pieces are called in Drouotese - have a way of creeping into nearly every sale. In the best of cases they are included in the preview on the day before the sale between 11 a.m. and 6 p.m. Sometimes they materialize during the one-hour interval, from 11 a.m. to noon, when prospective buyers have access to the items and can handle them before the auction begins at about 2 p.m.

The second element of unpredictability concerns prices, which vary more wildly than elsewhere partly because the sales are so poorly advertised that even concerned professionals often miss them. The auction organized on Feb. 10 by the Daniel Delaporte-Olivier Ricunier team has just provided a striking illustration of the erratic pattern that such sales fol-low, as well as of the interesting pieces to be

As usual at Drouot, the sale, consisting of a mixed bag of nearly anything to be seen in private houses, started off with the prints, drawings and paintings. These formed a bizarre assortment from the 16th through the mid-20th century, including a heavily over-painted portrait of the Milanese school "circa 1500" and a lot of academic art. Thirty of them had been graced with one-to-two-line en-tries in a catalog but, inevitably, the session began with "unlisted" works that accounted for half that part of the auction.

A handful were worth a close look. Most unusual were some etchings by Manuel Robbe, a rare artist known only to specialists in late-19th-early-20th-century French schools falling outside the mainstream of "modern" art. Robbe, whose work was exhibited at the Salon, where he got a modest bronze medal in 1900, did not belong to any of the recognized movements. He drew silhouettes in bold strokes reminiscent of Toulouse-Lautrec's manner but his mood is closer to Symbolist art with its suggestion of elfish mystery. Like Henri Riverière, he was primarily an engraver producing superb etchings in subdued blues, brownish mauves and olive yellows.

One of these, showing two naked women in a landscape with strange vegetation was dated 1902 and carried the penciled indication 22/25 - meaning that it was the 22d impression of a run of 25. It was sold for 4,756 francs, a fair price for a print in first-class condition with full margins that was a little masterpiece in its way, but too rarified to appeal to a wide pub-lic. Another, larger print of two women in a late Corot style landscape was knocked down

After that hors d'oeuvre, followed by less palatable drawings, some unlisted oils came up. At least one of those would have justified manship. more sophisticated methods of salesr The portrait of a woman standing in the austere garb of a 17th-century Dutch housewife was signed J. de Jager. It carried a date

"16..." which I did not have time to make out in the poor lighting of Drouot. The auctioneer had clearly not considered it worth his while. He appeared satisfied as he stated that the work was "signed, dated." which is a pity. J. de Jager is a little-known artist active in the third quarter of the 17th century whose work is still unrecorded in the main. He may not be a second Frans Hals, but at 3.364 francs, the largists ond Frans Hals, but at 3,364 francs, the largish portrait, about 80 centimeters high — dimensions were not mentioned — was laughably cheap. Ten times that figure would seem more like it.

Seconds later, it was followed by an interesting painting of the German school, about 80 by 60 centimeters. A woman with long hair is sitting in a hilly landscape with trees done in the fairy-tale manner of Gustave Dore, in blues and greens with touches of mauve and rusty brown. The author, Alexander Frenz, not only signed but carefully dated his work, done in 1912. Neither fact was mentioned by the auctioneer, who obviously hadn't read them. This offshoot of German Romanticism, influenced by both the English Pre-Raphaelite school and French Symbolism was knocked down at 6,916 francs — hardly an impressive price: There is a strong market for such paintings in Germany. Apparently no rich German happened to stroll through Drouot the day before when he could have caught sight of it.

The sale then proceeded with the cataloged section. While there were no more cases of blatant underpricing, the price pattern was inconsistent. Some minor pieces sold brilliantly and 50 others miserably.

Two matching portraits of women by the virtually unknown "Foucault" described as "a pupil of Monsieur Le Gros, drawing master at Tiron" got a three-line entry in the catalog quite an effort by the cataloger's standards. Done in black and red chalk, they still retained their nice Louis XVI period gilt wood frames, which was enough to send them shooting up to 6,380 francs. This is about as much as anyone would pay for the utterly conventional draw-ings. But minutes later when two highly decorative 17th-century paintings ascribed to the "Italian school" came up no one took any no-tice. "The Triumph of Flora" and "Apollo in his Chariot had obviously been intended to be set into the paneling of a stately house. The large, oval-shaped works, 110 by 150 centimeters each, were done in pleasing shades of blues, reds and touches of golden yellow, and there was quite a panache to Apollo's horses soaring over clouds. The pair was cheap at 4.750 francs.

It certainly was a bargain compared with the staggering prices paid for the 19th-century works that followed, mostly from painters whose names rarely blacken the pages of art historical studies. The most generous critic would be hard put to find a justification for them, even under the excuse of kitsch. Jacques Carabain's view of the "The Dogana and the Church of Santa Maria della Salute in Venice" is the kind of picture postcard used in the more conservative calendars of the French postal service. It was about a thousand times dearer at the enormous price of 23,670 francs.

The day's feat, however, was the price of 215,570 francs paid toward the end of the paintings sale for a gigantic interior scene, 197 by 157 centimeters, by one Albert Auhlet (1851-1938). Its documentary interest is undeniable. Every detail of what is obviously the drawing-room of a late 19th century hotel particulier, or town house, has been painstakingly painted as it once appeared in real life. A musician — the French composer Massenet looks at a musical score, as a diva, standing by his side, offers comments. Another man in the background, the composer Vincent d'Indy, looks on. Higher up, on the landing of a wood-en staircase, Debussy leans over the banister, following it all from a distance.

A year ago, the price might have been deemed low. Since then, kitsch has been going through a difficult period and its less colorful or extravagant products have been sinking.

What is the current world record price for an Aublet is above all an extraordinary price for a painting done in a drab color scheme that looks, at the very best, like an enlarged version RUSSELS - A Chinese army has arrived in Brussels, some of it sternly martial in armor-plated tunics, others military musicians marching with their comrades; some on horseback. The most striking variation is in size.

China has sent three of the recently discovered human-scale figures and one cavalry horse on this touring exhibition and it is these that are undeniably the main draw among all the other Chinese art treasures dating from 5,000 B.C. to the ninth century (at the Palais des Beaux-Arts until April 18). Discovered by chance in 1977 in the Chinese province of chance in 1977 in the Chinese province of Shaanxi, the life-size terra-cotta figures are part of an army, so far 7,000 strong, with more to come, embedded in deep trenches surrounding the burial tumulus of Emperor Qin Shi Huang, known as the First Emperor. The figures are modeled with sophisticated realism, each face probably a portrait of an actual solution. dier, archer, or commander, each detail of military uniform, armor, headdress, hairstyle, de-noting rank and age, is hyperreal art. Even the sole of the archer's sandal is neatly patterned.

The soldiers of Oin's army that the custom of burying live slaves and retinue along with dead princes had been abandoned by the time of the First Emperor, and there must have been many a sigh of relief throughout the army as the life-size effigies went into the open tunnels to be covered over completely with earth. They probably remembered that in an earlier dynasty whole chariots had been buried with live horses and live men. Two of the tall warriors stand utterly immobile; the kneeling archer conveys an extraordinary impression of vitality and alertness, the body very slightly pivoted so that his left knee supports the left forearm, right knee bent to earth in an attitude of instant readiness, the face very young and open. Buried two by two at the entrance of each long tunnel leading to the tomb, the archers were the first line of defense for their emperor to frighten off ill-wishers in the afterlife; then came the infantry, interspersed with cavalry units and chariots.

Dramatically posed on a platform protected by alarm systems that continually burst into strident warning as visitors inadvertently touch ropes with catalogs or coats, the warriors and chunky cavalry pony look stable and real. But after 2,000 years of earth-immersion, they are far from solid and require concentrated care in handling and transport. Suzanne Bertouille, honorary director of the Palais des Beaux-Arts and one of the exhibition's orga-nizers, says: "Just to unpack the horse alone

Terra-cotta musicians on a camel's back, from eighth-century tomb treasures.

In another room, two dozen Han dynasty figurines, miniature pottery warriors this time, are displayed in battle formation, marching soldiers and musicians, cavalry drawn up behind, all led by a jaunty commander out front. This terra-cotta army, discovered in 1965, had been buried a century later than the life-size figures protecting Emperor Qin, when custom had changed to using miniaturized figures.

They too are beautifully sculpted, with realism and finesse, features clear and expressive and varied, traces of the original painting still visible on a few. The riders sit straight in their painted saddles, one hand extended to hold reins taut and keep the horses' heads thrown back, the other to grasp a lance. But both reins and lances are missing from these miniature masterpieces; the weapons and shields were made from wood and survive only as broken or crumbling relics scattered in the earth beside the warriors. Partly because of a misunderstanding a few years ago over the Han dynasty miniature war-riors, this exhibition will not go to France. A Paris department store had imported replicas of these figures, on sale freely in museums in China and in special shops on excavation sites, as a commercial enterprise, but ambiguous advance publicity led to a widespread misconception that the replicas were supposed to be originals. The Chinese, staggered by the gullibility of a public imagining that 2,000-year-old figurines from their ancient tombs would ever be lent for exhibition in a department store, were also offended at the idea they might try to pass off fakes.

"It would be impossible to mistake a replica for an original," Bertouille says. "The real ones have been underground so long they are rough to the touch, flakes with tiny spots where the surface has crumbled. Replicas are smooth and unblemished." The copies are very popular souvenirs both in China and in Europe; the sales counter at the Palais des Beaux-Arts was almost sold out three days after the exhibition opened and more have had to be ordered.

The warriors are not the only treasures in this show, though inevitably they attract the most attention, since China is a long way to go to see them in their natural environment. "We are building a museum on the excavation site, roofing over a section of the trenches and leaving the figures down there," says Prof. Hu Yue Qlan, director of Shaanxi Museum. "That way visitors can see them almost as we found

After Denmark, Switzerland and Germany Brussels is the final stop for this show before it returns to China. The warriors are so Iragile the Chinese authorities feel it is unlikely they ONDON — On first entering the galleries of the Camden Arts Center, Arkwright Road, London N.W.3, one has the impression that the paintings, graphics, drawings and low reliefs on the wall are the finalists in an European all-comers arts competition.

A closer inspection confirms that the exhibits are by a multiplicity of hands, but the overall feeling is one of much greater elegance, subtlety, care for metier and precision of color and effect than are usually to be found in a European, or for that matter, American, group show.

Running until Feb. 21, this show, "Japanese Contemporary Art," is organized by the Japan Art and Culture Association of Tokyo in conjunction with the Japan External Trade Organization. It makes a splendid complement and contrast to the Great Japan Show at the Royal Since 1966 the association has promoted an annual competition for artists working in Japan, from which the 60 or 70 works judged best have been sent overseas to promote culture and international understanding." For this exhibition 38 works were selected from 685 submissions by 359 artists. However, to make this London show more representative of Japanese contemporary art, 18 other leading artists are by invitation showing a further 36 works, all created in 1980 or 1981.

So far as one may judge from this exhibition, the Japanese artist, like the Japanese industrialist, takes from Europe and America the raw ideas of any particular genre — surrealism, super-realism, art brut, abstract expressionism, systems art, college, photography, silkscreen printing, relief carving — and then adapts it in a peculiarly Japanese way, pushing it to the attention of its potentialities to produce magnetic product. to the utmost of its potentialities to produce masterly works.

Ay-o for example, uses an amalgam of figurative draftsmanship, calligraphy (in one case Roman, in the other Japanese), color bands and an erylic rainbow to summarize a holiday mood; Misao Domoto combines an organic leaf pattern, an interweaving of a hundred subtly graduated tones and geometric forms to portray the cosmos.

Most noteworthy of all is the subtle appreciation the Japanese artist

After Futurism — Depero in Rome

by Edith Schloss

OME - Fortunate Depere, together with Giacomo Balla, took on the "Reconstruction of the Universe" as promised in the Futurist Manifesto of 1914, with a vengeance. In his many paintings, mosaics, sculptures, wall hangings, sound poems etc., he pointed to the absurdity of preceding rules and regulations, and turned everything upside down and inside out with a wild glee. But all this activity, seemingly so quirky and playful, was actually ruled by the sober wit and the consistency of a very good artist.

Naturally a rambunctious movement like Futurism came to a dead halt and then its followers had to develop beyond it, each in his

Here (at Galleria Arco d'Alibert, 19 via Arco d'Alibert, until March 2) there are drawings from Depero's post-Futurist times, from 1918 until 1950 (he lived from 1892 to 1960). Several are close to the metaphysical. One very big one of 1920, never shown before, is the preparatory design for a wall hanging. The Big Battle, which is exhibited in the Metropolitan Museum of New York, where Depero lived from 1928 to 1930). The drawings, all lively and even funny, are quite controlled. There is nothing ponderous about the curvilincar compositions, which move fast and with ease, while informed by a quiet intelligence. It is a pity that Depero, putting many of our heavy-handed contemporaries in the shade, is not yet as well-known as he deserves.

Gastone Novelli's humor is less good-nathred than Depero's, closer to our own, more desperate times, (at the Galleria l'Isola, 5 via Gregoriana, until Feb. 28). He was born in 1925, was captured as a tecn-age partisan by the Germans, won the first prize in painting at the Venice Biennale in 1964, and died at 43. For Novelli, in the beginning there was the line, gorgeously twisting, cutting or free run-ting, and only then the image. With it he wove a sparkling and wiry fantasy accented with velvery dabs and fields of color in his paintings, telling sophisticated fables to sophisticated grown-ups, politically conscious or not. Whether he is like Twombly, or Twombly like him — both were active in Rome in the 1960s — is beside the point, because certain styles have a way of springing up simultaneously in certain periods.

Novelli's paintings are about bittersweet loves and woes and portents, mischievously arranged like alphabets, comics or homework: crumbs and clusters of words and sharp dabs and line forming brittle labyrinths, maps or

Since the paintings were hung on the very structure of their pencil marks, here the drawings alone show Novelli at his purest. Sometimes using the glued-on fragment of a child's drawing for a foil, even once alluding ironically to advertising the drawings are whimsical inventions, glittering insights, about sensual or intellectual pleasures, and reveal the workings of Novelli's spirit at its finest and most poetic. The exhibits in another gallery (Jarurakor, 20 via dei Pianellari, until March 5) usually look like objects in a bare and austere schoolroom, and indeed the gallery is dedicated to an educational purpose: to place certain recent art movements and artists into precise historical and social context.

This time it is truly far-out Piero Manzoni's turn to be analyzed. And the work of this late Dadaist, or rather early conceptualist, who died at the age of 30 in 1963, is a particularly poignant and challenging subject. Traces of Manzoni's activities are here conserved as if they were potsherds or botanical specimens of a museum, as they ought to be, for his expression was fragile, the mere concretion of his ideas, part of the life of the living artist. He was truly outrageous, and putting all conventions on the line, and at the same time managed to make the ridiculous exalting. This was probably somehow why the objects under his hand, despite themselves, immediately and fiendishly

A line a mile long painted on rolled-up cloth inside a drum, the artist's merda inside a can, an egg turned into art by the artist's thumb-print, a balloon that held the artist's breath, maps of nonexistent countries presented as if existing, - rickets, letters, numbers, as if from official documents (today Manzoni would certainly have manipulated computer cards to ion designer Fiorucci.

make a shambles of the idea of bureaucratic authority). His attack, seemingly improvised, was quite meditated, to throw us off balance, to push our preconceptions around, to free us to see things for ourselves for themselves. Nothing is holy in art, that is why it is holy. Manzoni tried to alter and so renew our sense Sol LeWitt, the American minimalist, most often explored the infinite possibilities and juxtapositions of geometry by drawing its in-tricacies in pencil or charcoal on large blank gallery walls. Now, however, at Ugo Ferranti gallery (26 via Tormillina, until March 2, he works with "Forms Derived From a Cube." Beside the preliminary framed drawings there are neat structures arranged on the ground in rows, made of white, varnished wood. Cut into, or jutting out, in a surprising variety of ways, pyramids, crosses, hexagons and combinations thereof, leaning or straight, they are angular monuments, which, as if molded by abstract space, also assert an effect on the real space around them.

Nicola de Maria, having practiced several up-to-date styles already, has lately come into the fold of the so-called Transayanguardia, a kind of new, gawky and pixielike figurative trend that at times refreshingly iconoclast and raw, can also affect a calculated innocence.

At Mario Diacono (25 piazza Mignanelli, until March 3). Nicola De Maria exhibits a handful of tiny watercolors no bigger than a postcard, with a few bright-colored elements on them - a cloud, a kite, lightning or rooftops, etc. — which are put into outsize frames. Besides, he has made an assemblage: He has covered one wall of the gallery with a large sheet of paper painted in rainbow colors, running a long line of obscure, would-be poetry across it, and putting a valise on the floor in front of it, also painted in rainbow colors. All this is supposed to represent "the work of the last five years." There is something selfindulgent and precious about the cute little pictures, and the suspicion that they merely follow a chic trend is confirmed by the cheery assemblage, which looks like nothing so much as a smart window dressing by the disco fashINTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY-SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13-14, 1982

The Associated Press

SEATTLE — The largest publicly financed, tax-exempt bond issue in U.S. history has left the Washington Public Power Supply System with $821 million for nuclear power plant construction — and rate payers with a $4.23 billion bill.

The bonds, sold Thursday night at an interest rate of 15.12 percent, will be used to continue work on three projects. For investors subjected to a 50 percent personal income tax rate, the return is equivalent to a taxable bond yielding 30.24 percent.

The interest expense over the life of the bonds will be $3.38 billion.

Construction cost of the three plants, not including interest on the bonds, is estimated at $12 billion. The supply system has already borrowed about $7 billion.

Italy Forced To Rethink Industry Plan

By John Tagliabue New York Times Service

ROME — Economic policies emerging in Italy make it clear that some of the country's favored industrial traditions and fiscal prejudices may be falling victim to the economic slump.

The government is now trying to increase cooperation between Fiat, the private company that is Italy's biggest automaker, and several state-owned companies in the auto, steel and telecommunications sectors. Montedison, the state-controlled chemicals group, is cooperating with private chemical companies, such as the Occi-dental Petroleum Corp.

In seeking this cooperation, govrument leaders have conceded that managers of state-owned companies are not able to cope with mounting industrial problems and need help from the private sector.

"There's no doubt we must find new forms," Alberto Mucci, chief economist at Banca Nazionale del Lavoro, Italy's biggest commercial bank, said speaking of the shifts in national industrial strategy. "Our economic and social problems, such as unemployment, are simply too weighty.

Critical Scrutiny

Italy's complex system of wage indexation, conceived as a tool to counter inflation, also seems to be falling victim to the economy's slowdown. Last fall, Italy's government convinced labor unions to accept a 16-percent ceiling on wage increases, although consumer prices are expected to increase by as much as 18 percent. The concesmore than 2 million.

Indeed, it was unemployment that led Italy to adopt the policies of nationalization and indexation that are meeting with growing di-sillusionment and critical scrutiny.

To stimulate employment, and to bolster the depressed economy in southern Italy, the government channeled huge sums of money into state-owned companies in critical sectors such as steel, chemicals and automobiles, placing plants in the poverty pockets of the south. Today, the Instituto per la Ricostruzione Italiana, the biggest of the state conglomerates, runs more than 500 companies in activities as diverse as steel, food, communications and shipping. The No. 2, Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi. operates in the fields of oil, chemicals and machinery.

Italy's current problems a many here say, because the country's growth rates in the 1970s were financed at the price of sharp inflation. While gross domest product grew by 4 percent in 1980, for example, the inflation rate rose by more than 20 percent.

The country's small businesses on the economy, have been squeezed increasingly by the 25 percent to 30 percent interest rates maintained to bring down inflation, as well as by soaring costs for labor, energy and raw materials.

To find the money for growing outlays, Italy sharply raised its forcign borrowing. Late last year, the central bank, the Ranca d'Italia, warned that the volume of debt was about $45 billion, more than the nation's currency reserves. Interest payments alone, the bank said, would total $7 billion to $8

Inability to deal with the deepening crisis brought down Italy's last government in July. Its succes sor, the five-party coalition of Pre-mier Giovanni Spadolini, has moved quickly to try to resolve the economic problems. Government economists say the plan is to push through a package of combined spending cuts and tax (Continued on Page 11, Col. 1)

RCA Introduces 8-Hour Blank Videotape New York Times Service

NEW YORK - RCA has introduced the first eight-hour blank tape for use in videocasette recorders, giving its users a two- to four-hour advantage over competitive tapes now on the market. The new tape carries a suggested retail price of $32.95, RCA said Thursday. RCA's Electronics Division also introduced two more models of its Selectavision line of videocasette recorders.

Toyota Denies Reports on U.S. Factory Plans

TOKYO — A spokesman for Toyota said Friday that his company still is studying the possibilities of car production in the United States and that no decision has been made on it.

The spokesman was commenting on Thursday's reports that Toyota has decided to set up a U.S. car plant in the mid-1980s.

Brunswick to Sell Division for $425 Million

The Associated Press CHICAGO — Brunswick, the unwilling target of a takeover bid by Whittaker, says it has agreed to sell its Sherwood Medical Industries subsidiary to American Home Products for $425 million.

The announcement came Thursday after a judge rejected Whittaker's bid to block the sale of Sherwood - reportedly one of Whittaker's chief objectives in the attempted takeover.

Broken Hill Reports 36% Decline in Profit

MELBOURNE — Broken Hill Proprietary Friday reported a profit of 87.5 million Australian dollars ($95 million) for the half that ended last Nov. 31, a drop of 36 percent from the 137.6 million dollars a year

The company added that the next six months' results will also be down because of continued poor market conditions.

The company said its worst performers were the steel and mineral sectors, which both showed losses. It added that its strongest performers were its oil and gas division and the John Lysaght Steel Products unit.

Saint-Gobain Sees 16% Increase in Sales

PARIS — Saint-Gobain said Friday it expects 1982 group sales to rise around 16 percent above the 1981 level, which it earlier estimated at 51 billion French frames ($8.5 billion).

DETROIT - The audited 1981 financial report of General Motors portrays a company with soaring debt, shrinking working capital and runaway capital spending.

The report, released Thursday, shows that GM took on more than $1.4 billion in long-term debt in the final three months of 1981 more than what most of the Fortune 500 companies generate in

The heavy fourth-quarter borrowing brought GM's long-term debt to a record $3.8 billion at year's end — twice the $1.89 bil-lion the company owed a year ear-

Most of GM's borrowing has been done overseas. But Thursday's report indicated that $500 million came from a recent borrowing against its New York City office building, and another $660 million represents existing U.S. short-term debt that will be refi-

As reported earlier, GM recorded a relatively small profit of $333 million for 1981 and would have been in the red except for tax credits and the earnings of its finance and insurance subsidiaries. It was something of a turnsround from the previous year's deficit of $763 million, GM's first loss since 1921.

The more detailed financial results made public Thursday show that the turnaround occurred primarily in the United States where, on a pre-tax basis, the company said it carned $289 million. Tax credits and tax deferrals sent that total to $763 million. In Europe, however, where sales have also been weak and where GM is spending hundreds of millions of dollars on new plants, the company lost $427 million. The previous year, GM lost $559 million in Europe.

Despite GM's unprecedented borrowing its working capital plunged from a year earlier by nearly two-thirds to $1.16 billion as of Dec. 31. That was sharply higher than where it stood at the end of the third quarter but represents the heavy fourth-quarter bor-record borrowing because the pro-longed slump in U.S. and Europe-an car and truck sales has left it without the internal resources to pay for a massive overhaul of its nts and vehicles.

That capital spending is proving far more of a burden than GM expected, the final 1981 figures confirm. GM spent $9.7 billion last year, the company said — 17 per-cent more than it planned.

GM, scheduled to spend $40 billion in capital outlays from 1980 through 1984, had expected to spend $8.3 billion of that amount last year. As recently as October, a top GM executive said the 1981 spending would come to $9 billion.

BUSINESS NEWS BRIEFS Ford and Union Reach Tentative Agreement on Contract

By John Holusha

New York Times Service
DEARBORN, Mich. — The United Automobile Workers and Ford Motor have reached tentative agreement on an "eco-nomic framework" for a new contract, but UAW president Douglas A. Fraser warned that other issues remained to be resolved.

Both sides in the negotiations said Thursday the pace was quickening. Peter J. Pestil-lo, Ford's vice president for labor relations. said he expected a settlement by Friday evening. The company has said it needs wage and benefit concessions from workers to compete with Japanese automakers.

Mr. Fraser indicated that the economic framework included concessions by the union, among them elimination of the 3-percent annual pay increase that the workers had in the past. It was not known if the union had accepted limitations on cost-of-14, and last until Sept. 14, 1984. Both Mr. Fraser and Mr. Pestillo said the economic framework dealt primarily with the concessions the company was seeking and that the remainder of the talks would focus on union proposals to limit the amount of work the company farms out to foreign and non-union domestic sources, and on plant closings.

Asked if he was confident of a contract being signed, Mr. Pestillo said, "If they like my [contract] language as much as I like their money, then we'll have an agreement." Unlike General Motors, which had proposed linking union concessions to reduc-tions in the price of automobiles. paid time off and defer future pay increases. Mr. Fraser said the union was seeking stronger assurances on job security than the company had yet offered and warned that the talks could still break off, despite the tentative accord on money issues.

"Nothing is settled until everything is settled," he said.

Although Mr. Fraser said the talks were only about "50 percent of the way home,"

Mr. Fraser said the issues of profit-sharing and union participation in company decision making remained to be resolved. along with job security.

He declined to confirm a report that the union concessions would save Ford $1 bil-lion over the life of the contract, saying the actual figure would be affected by future developments. But he added that "Ford will have lower unit labor costs immediately."

Estimates place Ford's hourly labor costs at $21.17 in wages and fringe benefits.

U.S. Car Dealers See Rebates as Scant Help

By Thomas L. Friedman

New York Times Service
DETROIT — With their inventory of unsold cars at the highest level in history, the five leading au-tomakers in the United States have begun a "rebate war" in a mad cramble for shares of the shrinking U.S. market.

This week marked the first time ever that General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, American Motors and Volkswagen of America all have offered rebate incentives simultaneously, and early reports indicate that the discounts are spurring car

But despite the improved sales essociated with discount marketing, many dealers, analysts and even some manufacturers are surprisingly unenthusiastic about the rebate programs.

The higher sales, they contend, are dangerously illusionary be-cause the market is not really being enlarged; people are timing their purchases to coincide with the rebates. The auto company profits are not likely to be fattened by the discounts, because the rebates almost always cost more money than they generate. The only ones to have greeted the rebates with unalloyed enthusiasm have been the consumers.

"I just hope the rebates aren't here to stay," said Mark Herrmann, a New York City Buick dealer, "All we are doing is borrowing sales from the coming months without making the market any bigger. In the process we are conditioning people like Pavlov's dogs to only come out when the rebate bell rings. It is going to be very difficult to deprogram them."

Friction Created

The rebates have created a certain amount of friction between which highlights their parallel — but nonetheless different — perspectives on the discount pro-

According to a senior research analyst at Ford, manufacturers approach rebates primarily hoping to lose as little money as possible. The decision to offer rebates is taken essentially to move out backlogged dealer inventory, to keep factories running at reasonable levels and to protect market share from other manufacturers offering rebates so that when economic conditions improve the company's customer and dealer base will be

"Rebating is the last thing you want to do as far as marketing is concerned," said Robert D. Lund, vice president for sales and marketing at General Motors. "It is a means of fleshing out inventory and maintaining market share. It is not looked upon as a way of generating higher total revenue, since you are effectively giving away The Ford official said: "The reason you rebate is because when your volume drops off and you start to lose market share, it may cost you $200 more a car to cover your fixed costs. With the rebates in place, it may only cost you $80 a

These calculations by the car markers were readily apparent during the past month. According to the manufacturers' reports for December, 1981, Chrysler, which has had a more or less permanent rebate in effect for the past year. had a 13.4 percent share of the domestic auto sales market, up at least 2 percentage points from a year earlier. Ford and GM, which did not have rebates in effect, had 20.1 and 61.2 percent shares, respectively. The remaining shares were divided between American Motors and Volkswagen.

On Jan. 13, Ford introduced a rebate program offering 5 percent off on its popular Escort and Lynx compacts until April, plus two years of free maintenance. By the end of January, 1982, Ford's market share was up to 28 percent, GM's down to 57.6 percent and Chrysler's down to 11.4 percent.

GM, seeing the erosion of its market share because of the rebates, and having already promised the public price reductions growing out of contract nego-tiations with the United Automobile Workers, was forced to join the fracas. In the first week of February, GM instituted rebates ranging from $500 to $2,000 on selected cars delivered between Feb. 1 and March 31.

Ford and Chrysler quickly re sponded by broadening their re-bate programs, while Volkswagen announced its own giveback plan. "When everyone starts rebat-ing," Mr. Lond said, "the market shares eventually go back to where they normally are, except every-one's prices are lower."

Even if the market shares return to traditional patterns, the makers argue that the improved sales. though they many prove tempo-rary, help them and their dealers with cash flow and generate some dealer-ordering momentum for the spring so that factories can operate loser to capacity. That at least is the theory, but it could be headed for trouble in today's marketplace. Since last year the dealers have come to grasp fully the essential truth about rebates: The rebated car you sell today is a nonrebated car you probably will not sell tomorrow. "Sure the rebates have been helping with some sales," said Scott Dreisbach, a Pontiac, Mich., Buick dealer. "But that doesn't mean I have increased my orders for the spring like GM expects. I learned my lesson last year. In February, 1981, we had a rebate, sales went up and I ordered an extra 100 cars for the spring. But as soon as the rebates ended last April, sales dropped way off, and I am still sitting with 60 of those

U.S. Money Supply Climbs; Stock Prices in N.Y. Mixed

From Agency Dispatches
NEW YORK — Prices on the New York Stock Exchange closed mixed Friday in lackluster trading as investors moved to the sidelines ahead of the money supply figures, released after the close. The Federal Reserve said that the M-1 measure of the money supply rose $2.3 billion to $449.7 billion for the week ended Feb. 3. Analysts had projected M-I for the week to be anywhere from slightly up to down as much as $2 billion.

For three of the last four Mondays, the market has dropped sharply because increases smaller-than-expected declines in M-1 were announced the preceding Friday. Analysts said investors did not want to get caught in the same pattern this week.

The Dow Jones industrial average was narrowly higher most of the day but then inched lower in afternoon trading to close off 0.86 at 833.81. Advances edged dec-lines, however by about 690 to 660 and volume slid to 37.07 million shares from the 46.73 million traded Thursday.

Analysts also attributed the slow day to the fact that many traders were already away for a four-day holiday weekend. The markets will be closed Monday.

Analysts believe the market basically is still in a downward trend as worries over budget deficits and high interest rates continued to occupy traders. They believe unless thing changes the market's direction, it may test the Dow's 824 level set last September, a 1981

He also said that sluggish world economies could cause sharply reduced inflation and perhaps even deflation this year.

ty among community steelmakers," one source said. EEC sources confirmed that an agreement had been reached to hold down exports, but said the level might not be regarded as modest in the United States.

Seven major U.S. firms last month filed more than 100 suits alleging that EEC companies were dumping steel on the U.S. market or receiving illegal subsidies.

Talks between U.S. and EEC officials in Washington this week failed to resolve the rift over steel.

U.S. trade representative William E. Brock said at the end of the talks that he saw little chance of a negotiated settlement to the dispute, adding that the suits were likely to run their full course. This could lead to the impos for cutting second quarter exports was to head off the threat of retroactive duties.

European industry sources said there was a feeling that moderation was necessary in a bid to avoid an effective closing of the U.S. market which could lead to a new and disastrous price-cutting war among producers deprived of a vital outlet.

Underwriters Worried by SEC Rule Proposal

By Tim Cattington

NEW YORK — A new rule proposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission is threat-ening to transform securities underwriting from a gentlemanly art to a financial roller derby involving fast-paced risk takers.

The proposed change, known as rule 462A.

would allow corporations to file a single registration statement for two years of financings, and, during that span, jump in and out of the market at will. Buried in a package of rules designed to cut red tape, the plan could revolutionize the way big corporations meet their financing needs. It also threatens to fracture old allegiances and time-honored procedures involved in securities underwriting. Usually, borrowers rely on their traditional investment banker to put together a syndicate of banks, often the same institutions, to underwrite and market a public issue. Eyebrows can still be raised on Wall Street when a major borrower turns to a different lead manager or allows new names to appear among the top tier underwriters. By promising to create a high-stakes bidding process for new securities, the plan threatens to intensify the already growing concentration of financial power among the biggest institutions in the United States. Dismay over the proposed change is only beginning to arise. Last week, Robert H.B. Baldwin, the chief of Morgan Stanley, flew to Washington to deliver an emphatic message to SEC Chairman John Shad: Stop the rule. Whether the commission heeds the investment banker's advice will be known in as little as two weeks, when the agency is expected to

But some of Morgan Stanley's largest investment banking clients — Exton, U.S. Steel Corp. and Du Pont — have endorsed the plan in letters to the SEC.

Morgan Stanley, kingpin of Wall Street's big underwriting managers, is seen by many investment bankers as the firm with the most to lose if the rule goes through. The old-line investment bank could see its hegemony badly shaken as rivals snatch business that otherwise would have been filtered to investors through syndicates run by Morgan. Morgan in a letter to Shad does not say its own underwriting profits would be pared if the rule were adopted. But it does point to another set of losers — the regional securities firms throughout the United States, many of which have recently sold out rather than compete with the heavily capitalized financial giants forming in New York and Chicago. Other firms are taking notice as well. David Batten, a managing director at First Boston, thinks the fallout will be felt mainly in the bond market, where interest-rate volatility has already made market timing an obsession. "It's the equivalent for the bond business of May Day, 1975, for the stock business," he said, referring to the end of the fixed brokerage commission system. Others see rule 462A as a "Europeanizing" of the U.S. bond markets. They believe the new environment under the rule will be most similar to the present Eurobond market, where negligible registration requirements enable companies to scoop up hundreds of millions of dollars on short notice. Rather than syndicates, so-called "bought deals" dominate.

Regression Seen

In the U.S. markets, after several streamlining moves by the SEC, some issues can be brought to market in as little as 48 hours after filing a shortened registration statement. While that period seemed lightning fast two years ago, some experts think it is long enough to cause an issuer to miss one of today's muchdiscussed interest-rate "windows," financial jargon for the fleeting downers in rates that make debt financing suddenly attractive.

the greatest flexibility without diminishing investor protection," said Lee Spencer, who heads the SEC Corporate Finance Division.

agreement on whether investors would be pro-tected fully. John Whitehead, Goldman Sachs senior partner, said that he sees the rule as a possible "regression to the 1929 pre-commission days," when new securities offerings arrived with scant information on the finances of the issuer. Morgan officials similarly worry that investors would not have time to review

Merrill Lynch has taken a guardedly posi-tive stance on rule 462A. In an analysis pre-pared for its investment banking clients, the nation's largest securities firm said that the rules "offer a range of advantages over current practices." Merrill Lynch then explained that with no time between pricing and offering, a managing underwriter with substantial capital may be in a position to take down an entire offering without extensive syndication, resulting in potential savings in time and cost."

Merrill Lynch also understood its special advantage as an underwriter in such situations - the largest distribution network on Wall Street, "An important factor behind a firm's one major fear — that they may be bypassed. Once a corporation has filed an initial registrtion statement one of the big investing institutions, such as a bank, insurance company or motival found, could call up a corporate treasurer directly to bid on a block of securities. "It's entirely possible that the whole industry could could go to direct distribution to institutions; that would be the worst-case scenario."

Soviets Criticize Japan on Trade

TOKYO — Soviet Foreign Trade Minister Nikolai Patolichev, in an interview published here, Friday accused Japan of following U.S. sanctions against Moscow and bringing bilateral economic relations to their lowest level

He told the Asahi Shimbun in Moscow that bilateral trade and economic relations are at an imprecendented low because Japan had been losing the opportunity to expand ties by following the United States in imposing sanctions against the Soviet Union.

Mr. Patolichev was quoted as saying, "Japan is entirely responsible for this." He added that expansion of trade and economic relations would lead to mutual benefits because Japan and the Soviet Union are neighbors.

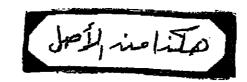

The newspaper quoted Mr. Patolichev as saying economic sanctions had affected two-way trade, which totaled $4.2 billion in 198 k compared with $7 billion in trade between the Soviet Union and Finland.

Official Japanese statistics show trade with He told the Asahi Shimbun in Moscow that Official Japanese statistics show trade with Moscow rose 13.8 percent last year to $5.28 billion compared to trade growth with the U.S. of 14.5 percent and 10.5 percent with china.

Loyal AT&T Shareholders Perplexed by Split

By N.R. Kleinfield New York Times Service

NEW YORK - Flush with inherited money, Ruth Spencer put some of it into American Telephone & Telegraph stock soon after she got out of college. Now retired and a widow living in Terrell, Texas, she still has the stock, but with AT&T splitting up the Bell System, she isn't sure what to do with it.

"Up to now, Telephone has been plenty good to this shareholder," she said. "I've read every little smithereen I can find, and I've clipped them and marked them and puzzled over them. Certainly, anything that's new is fearful, though I'm glad that that dad-gum suit

"I'll tell you what I'm going to do. I'm going to keep my stock, but I'm going to watch it like a hawk. Don't think I'm not."

Every member of the phone company's farflung family of 3 million shareholders has been watching AT&T stock with an accountant's keen eye ever since the tumultuous announcement some four weeks ago that the phone system would be broken up. Once the breakup takes place, shareholders are due to get a proportionate number of shares in each of the spun-off companies; they will also ching to AT&T stock. Many Wall the local operating companies will probably remain stable with a respectable return.

No shareholder family comes as big and as heterogeneous as Bell's. More than two thirds of the 3 million owners are individuals. Long the favorite of widows and orphans, the stock is given as graduation and wedding gifts. It is handed down from generation to generation.

AT&T records divulge relatively little about the actual composition of the stockholder stew, but shareowner representatives have a good idea of who they are. Twice as many women as men own the stock, and there are more than 200,000 custodian accounts for minors. Most individual holders are more than 40 years old, and a preponderance of them live in Florida and California, suggesting that they

Some 300,000 stockholders are AT&T emoyees, about a third of the work force, and 40,000 institutions hold stock. AT&T will not disclose who the biggest individual holder is, only that the person has 95.000 shares.

Record Unimpressive

All in all, AT&T stock has not racked up an overly impressive record in recent times, de-spite its popularity (and, in fact, some financial analysts, only partly in jest, have gone so far as to wonder out loud whether in recent years one might have done as well by leaving one's money buried in the mattress).

The yield is currently roughly 9.5 percent, well below what could be earned in a money market fund or in the bond market. But the reputation for stability continues to serve as a powerful bait. The company has never skipped or lowered its dividend, even during the De-

In the future, the guess of securities analysts is that the shares in the local companies will behave like those of electric utilities. Their price will not waver much, but the yield will be decent. AT&T, however, as it moves into hightechnology markets, may evolve into a growth stock that could become a carrot for younger, risk-oriented investors. Gerald Morgan, an analyst at Bache Halsey Stuart Shields, for instance, has estimated that when the phone company is broken up the sum market value of the stock issued to current AT&T shareholders will hover in the $73 to $75 range, a good bit more than the $57 to $59 range that phone company stock has recently been trading at.

TRUTH . . . AND CONSEQUENCES

Seven Who Would Not be Silenced

By Greg Mitchell. 320 pp. $14.95. Dembner/Norton, 500 Fifth Ave., New York 10110 Reviewed by Robert Wilson

Seven Who Would Not Be Silenced." Kuykendall had recently admitted to the FBI that he and an accomplice had poured caustic soda on unused fuel rods at Vepco's Surry nuclear power station, where he was training to be a control-room operator. Vepco claimed that the caustic had done more than $1 million worth of damage. Kuykendall told the press he had committed this crime to dramatize what he claimed to be a lack of security at the nuclear plant.

I was talking to Kuykendall with the thought of writing an article about him. Here was the story of a courageous and conscientions man standing up to an uncaring corporation. But during the course of that morning, my enthusiasm for the story drained away. Kuykendall, in talking about the very serious step he had taken, seemed to me too glib, too freely selfcongratulatory. It seemed to me that Kuykendall might as easily have done the deed out of a thirst for publicity as a need to "commit truth," in Mitchell's phrase.

Heroic and Human

One of the strengths of "Truth and Consequences" — Mitchell's admirable book about seven seemingly ordinary people who, when faced with a moral problem the rest of us might be tempted to ignore, rocked the boat hard — is that the author al-lows his subjects to be both heroic and human. His respect for them is unabashed, and yet he will report, for instance, that Lois Gibbs, a Niagara Falls housewife who organized vic tims of the Love Canal chemical dump into a force that had President Carter and New York Gov. Hugh Carey hopping, was thought by some of her neighbors to be a "flaming radical" and by others to be "quick to bark and happy to crawl after every bone the state tossed her way."

Or, in his profile of Hugh Kaufman, a lower-middle-level bureaucrat at the Environmental Protection Agency who has repeatedly used his contacts in the media and on Capitol Hill to embarrass EPA superiors who drag their feet on the toxic-waste problem (and who has miraculously kept his job), Mitchell dryly remarks that "Kaufman had a terrific working relationship with people he didn't work with," he goes on to summarize the often unflattering results of mostly off-the-record interviews he conducted with Kaufman's co-work-

The subject of Mitchell's most com-The subject of Mitchell's most compelling profile is a West Virginia sheriff named Ronald Donell, who went undercover to fight the illegal gambling (said to be mob-controlled) that had become a way of life in his county. Donell ended up catching the county prosecutor with his hand in the till all the way up to the shoulder. As we follow Donell into situations where he parrowly misses being exwhere he narrowly misses being ex-posed, Mitchell's narrative has the tension of a good thriller. Then the story leads us through the next election, which becomes a referendum on Donell's undercover work. Disillu-sioningly, he loses. We learn in an afterword that Donell worked for a time as a night watchman. He now helps his brother run a beer distribua morning drunking coffee and chatting in the living room of William Kuykendall, one of Gree Mirabell. clerk with the Veterans Administration in Chicago began to piece together the effects of Agent Orange of Viet-nam veterans (until someone realized how much it would cost if the government had to take responsibility for poisoning its soldiers), went on welfare for two years after she lost her job; the VA has recently given it back. Jim Maslinski, who witnessed a prison rape and then broke the jail-house code by testifying against the rapist, is a marked man (another inmate who ran into him at a hearing remarked incredulously, "Maslinski, what are you doing still alive?"). He tried to commit suicide five times, but is now out of jail and working as a building superintendent. Only Hugh Kaufman, who expected to lose his job when the Reagan administration came to town, seems to have landed on his feet.

Complex Sets of Circumstances

In his afterword, Mitchell does a lot of musing about why these people took the chance and paid the price when others in similar situations did not. It's not surprising that this line of inquiry takes him only as far as the truism that virtue is its own reward. The profiles themselves suggest that it is impossible to simplify the motiva-tions of such people into a neat gener-ality. That's why Mitchell spent so much time with his subjects, why it is necessary for him to take us into their lives, as he does successfully. These seven acted out of complex sets of circumstances and, despite their claims that they would do it all again, it's not clear to me that, if the circumstances were only slightly altered, they would. Mitchell has a good eye for virtue and, although the issues raised by the and, although the issues raised by ine seven are shocking and demoralizing, the book is full of people who do the right thing. Not the least among them are a handful of young reporters for medium-sized newspapers — Russ Mitchell, Ernie Gates and Michael Brown — who listened to these stories. Brown — who listened to these stories in the first place and took them to the public. Greg Mitchell does well to give them their due.

Italy to Cut Tolls, Tourist Gas Price

ROME - Italy plans to reintroduce cut-price gasoline coupons and lower superhighway tolls for visitors in an effort to halt a decline in the number of foreign tourists.

From April foreign drivers will be able to buy coupons giving them a 30 percent reduction on gasoline, which currently costs 960 lire a liter (about $3.46 a gallon) for the top grade, and concessions valued at up to 25,000 lire (about $20) on Italy's expensive mo-torway network, the tourist board

Last year 16.5 million foreigner came to Italy on holiday, compared with a peak of 18 million in 1979. Hotel operators have been calling for reintroduction of the gasoline-coupon system which was scrapped in Decem-ber, 1979.

Griffey Ponders the Mysteries of a New Life in New York

By Joseph Durso New York Times Service

CINCINNATI — Ken Griffey eased his Mercedes 380-SEC along the interstate. crossed from Kentucky into Ohio and peered into the future. Here he was the quiet man of the Cincinnati Reds. sitting in his quiet car, headed for his home in the quiet suburbs of a quiet city. And, down the road? A new life as the rightfield replacement for the unquiet Reggie Jackson on the decidedly unquiet New York Yank-

"What will I say when I walk into the clubhouse next week?" he reflected. "What does a man say when he walks into a clubhouse after 13 years someplace else? That's what I'm trying to figure out. "I don't know what they expect. Do they expect an athlete to do an act in New York? I don't know. It's all a mystery to

The Mercedes kept purring, and George Kenneth Griffey kept purring. Stakes Are High

"The stakes are high over there," he said. "Everything is high over there. This place is very conservative. New York is Times Square on New Year's Eve.

"Look, the Big Red Machine had hoopla too. But all the hoopla was about Pete Rose, Joe Morgan and Johnny Bench. Me and George Foster and Danny Driessen were the new kids. But nobody has the intrigue of the Yankees. The tradition.
The House That Ruth Built."

"I know one thing," he said, his eyes widening. "I'm not taking anybody's place. Some people may have it in the back of their mind, but I can't help that I can't do what Reggie Jackson does. He hits home runs, he drives in runs, he likes all the attention. If George Foster was coming to the Yankees, I could see the

The mystery started to unfold this week when the Yankees opened their early spring training camp for pitchers and cauchers in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. It will thicken for Griffey next week when he walks into the clubhouse for the first time. switching uniforms and leagues, a .307 hitter after 1,047 games with the Reds, a sprinter who outran 156 infield hits and stole 102 bases in his first five seasons in the National League, a man who helped sweep the Yankees in the World Series of 1976. Now a million-dollar-a-year newcomer on a team in transition from the five-year reign of Reggie Jackson. Griffey pulled the black Mercedes into the driveway of the nine-room house in the stylish Mount Airy section of Cincinnati, parked behind his wife's brown Audi and the family's two-toned Ford Bronco truck. Inside the house, Alberta Griffey was watching a television set in the kitchen. In the family room one flight down, trophies flanked a wall-to-wall brick fire-

"If I was a scout, what would I report about Ken Griffey?" he asked, and then replied: "Very easygoing, likes to take things in stride, quiet, very quiet, even subdued. My older brother told me once that no one's better than you when you get between the white lines. I guess it's my

But, if the Yankees think that they traded two minor leaguers for a pussycat last Nov. 4, one week before Griffey was scheduled to enter the free agent market, then the pussycat has big news for them.

"Being subdued has cost me," he said. "It probably cost me the batting championship on one day in 1976. But I learned from that, I learned never to let anybody else make a major decision for me any-

The day of decision was the final day of the season six years ago. With one game to go. Griffey held a 3-point lead in batting average over Bill Madlock, then with the Chicago Cubs.

"I even had 38 infield hits that year Griffey remembered. "They said that I'd introduced a new statistic into baseball: the infield hit. Not the bunt, but the ground ball you beat out.

"Anyway, before the last game, they held a meeting on me. The big boys, Sparky Anderson and Joe Morgan and Johnny Bench and Pete Rose and Tony Perez. They tried to figure out how I could win the batting championship and, when they came out, Sparky decided to sit me down for the game. I said I wanted to play, but in those days I didn't make waves. They said that Madlock always sat down, so let him win it if he was going to win it.

"We were playing Atlanta that day and, by the time we heard how Madlock was doing in his game, he was 3 for 3. So Sparky sent me up to hit for the pitcher, and I struck out. He kept me in the game, and I struck out again. I went 0 for 2, Madlock went 4 for 4 and beat me out, 338 to

Not Fasily Excitable

"They were worried that I'd have a bad season the next year," he said. "You know, I might be so depressed from losing the batting title on the last day. But even in the Little League when I was a kid, I said that was I never got too excited. And I didn't let this gery, for now.

Reds made his point in another crisis. Late in July, he hit a double against the Mets in Shea Stadium, rounded second base, looked down the line, cut back to the bag and felt something pop in his left knee. He played for a few days, but the knee kept hurting. After several examinations by several doctors, they found that the kneecap was rubbing the bottom part of the thigh bone. On Aug. 14, Dr. Frank Jobe of the Los Angeles Dodgers operat-

"Some people felt I was quitting on the ball club when I had the operation during the season," Griffey said, "But I was helping the club.

The way it was, I couldn't get a jump off first base in front of hitters like Bench and Foster. You get a guy like Phil Nick-ro, with the best knuckleball in the league, throwing four wide ones to you and not even coming close — you know he's putting you on base because he knows you can't run. So I decided to have the opera-

"Afterwards, I was kind of depressed. Dr. Jobe said it would always be there, the knee situation. But he told me if I kept the muscle above the knee strong, it would keep the kneecap from sliding.

But are the Yankees getting damaged goods for their five-year, $5-million pack-

The Yankees had me tested by their doctor just before the trade," Griffey said. They wanted to check the knee. I guess it was one of the biggest issues they had to resolve. They found that there was an 18 to 20 percent decrease in strength in the left left from the right one. But the doctors said that was normal after this kind of sur-

"He'll play right field," Lemon said, when asked about Griffey, "I don't know that much about him, or his knee, We'll find out. But I don't want him out there playing burt.

"Where will he bat? Somewhere in the top of the lineup. All I know is what his two managers at Cincinnati told me. Spar-ky Anderson and John McNamara both said: 'Just pencil him in, and forget about

A New Dimension

Dave Winfield, who came to the Yankees one year ago from the San Diego Padres, considered life without Reggie Jackson and said:

"It's a whole new dimension. We lose. some power, we lose some personality. some commotion. We lose Reggie. But we gain a steady player, a guy who can hit and run and play defense. They tell me Griffey gets overlooked in the lineup because he doesn't talk much, he's not flamboyant. But he knows how to win And he'll do even better on grass than he did on artificial turf."

Griffey acknowledges that he's emotional about his life with the Yankees. He said he had met Steinbrenner only twice. and described him as "a man of action, a man of his word." He also said that he liked Reggie Jackson, believed last fall that the Yankees would sign Jackson and "had no thought that my going to the Yankees would have any impact on his career."

"I'm excited about this," Griffey said, making his strongest concession of the day. They are a super team. What il hapday. '

NEW YORK - Gerry Cooney, whose injured left shoulder is only '75 percent recovered," according to his trainer, was to be examined by his doctor Friday to determine whether he can make his $10-million March 15 date with Larry Holmes.

"As of right now, the fight is definitely on," said Mike Jones, who with Dennis Rappaport co-manages Cooney, the undefeated top-ranked contender.

But Jones, Rappaport and Vic-tor Valle, the trainer, will not put Cooney in the ring with Holmes, the undefeated World Boxing Council heavyweight champion,

The event Olson has been saving up for has arrived: The Millrose Games on Friday at Madison Square Garden in New York. "I'm going to cut loose," he said. Usually in a meet, all but one or two vaniters are eliminated when the bar gets to 18 feet. Then those remaining get to decide what height to go for. In the past, when Olson has had a meet wrapped up he has been content to go for a half-inch over the existing mark. But at the Millrose Games, he said, "If we get to 18-4 or so and I have it see up, I'm going straight to 19 feet.

And I'm going to make it.
"I feel like I have that 19-foot jump in me. I don't want to sound cocky, but if you need a story about a 19-foot pole vanit, you'd better be there. It's a great place to jump and I've been psyched about it forever."
Success has been sudden for Olson, who teaches a Bible class in Abilene and who, with his shagey blond hair, bears a resemblance to squeaky-clean singer John Denver. Two years ago he was one of the top U.S. vaulters, but nagging minor injuries kept him from soaring to record heights. Then, in a horri-ble training accident in September, 1980, he broke every bone in his left wrist and dislocated his left clbow. It was such a mess doctors told him he'd be bucky to regain use of the wrist at all. He was in a cast for six months. The doctors said he'd never vault again.

"I saw the X-rays," said Olson. "It looked like scrambled eggs." He had fallen during a ropevaulting exercise, using a rope hanging from the gym ceiling to soar over a bar. Olson landed on the gym floor from 18 feet up. But even before the cast came;

off he was back at work. His coach, Don Hood, told him that the use of the left hand was not critical. He found his worst problem was in carrying the pole on the

Clampett, Trevino Ahead

The Associated Press HONOLULU - Bobby Clampett conquered howling winds and driving rain with a no-bogey, 5-un-der-par 67 and took the lead Thursday in the weather-delayed and uncompleted first round of the Hawaiian Open golf tournament. In Melbourne, meanwhile, Lee Trevino took a one-stroke lead affer two rounds of the Victorian was two, three or four inches run, when almost all the weight is borne by the left wrist. In the actual vault most of the stress was on his right side, so he modified his run and carry and this winter things all came together. In January he set a record of 18-61/2 at the Meadowlands in New Jersey. Then came the Toronto and Louisville jumps. Oddly, his emergence is coming where he least expected it: indoors.

He prefers outdoors, where he can use a longer and generally faster runway. His personal indoor record before this year was 17-10, but he has already jumped 18-71/2 outdoors, where the world record is three-fourths of an inch over 19

"That's what's got me so excit-ed," Olson said in his drawl. "I've increased my p.r. [personal record] by almost a foot indoors. If I'd been outdoors, with good condi-tions, I think I'd already be at 19 feet and over.'

Foster Withdraws

NEW YORK (UPI) - Greg Foster, the World Cup hurdles champion, has withdrawn from Millrose Games because of a pulled hamstring of the right leg. The hurdles field still includes Renaldo Nehemiah. Willie Gault. Rod Milburn and Mike Shine.

Although there is great concern in the Cooney camp, it is still be-lieved that the shoulder, which has shown recent improvement, will be fully recovered in time. # Springing Leaks

Reagan, as with all recent presidents, is obsessed with leaks in his administration. He doesn't understand why people who work for him continually spill the beans to the media. And as with all presidents, he insists he's going to put a stop to the leaks at any cost. With all due respect to Mr. Reagan, he has as much chance of stopping leaks in Washington as he does getting his wife to serve State Dinners on Tupperware.

There are all sorts of leaks in Buchwald

Washington. The most common is the "official government leak." Any administration learns very quickly that the best way to set off a trial bal-loon is to leak it to one or two news sources.

Example: "This is Apollo at the White House and what I'm going to tell you is not for attribution. The president is going to put an ss profits tax on suntan oil." The story is printed in Krup-nik's column. All hell breaks loose with the suntan oil lobby, and the president decides to forget it. The next day the president's oress secretary announces, "There is absolutely no foundation to the story that there will be an excess profits tax on suntan oil.

Krupnik calls up Apollo at the White House. "You made me look like a fool."

Apollo says, "We'll make it up to you. We're sending over a topsecret CIA report on a KGB call girl ring at the United Nations."

The second most common leak involves someone in the administration who is out to get someone

"If you write it, I'll deny it, but Malibu was chewed out by the president yesterday for telling Ed Meese the only one in the administration who believes the 1983 budget figures is Bonzo." The reporter calls up Malibu and asks him if the story is true. Malibu says, "The one person who could have told you that was Burbank, If you want the real story, Burbank was caught red-handed stealing jellybeans out of the president's personal jar, and he's

unless there is another person in the room."

The third type of leak, which is impossible for Mr. Reagan to stop, comes from a disenchanted bureaucrat who sends inside memoranda in plain white envelopes to columnists all over town.

They read like this: "From the Secretary's Administrative Aide:

"To All Employees.

You will soon receive a questionnaire which must be filled out and returned to the Secretary's office no later than Friday, giving your views on Abortion, Gun Control, Busing and Prayers in School. The purpose of this survey is to help the Secretary get to know his staff better and to encourage a smoother and more efficient relationship in the department. If you do not wish to fill out the questionnaire, you may return it with a note stating your reasons why you refuse to be a team player."

* * * There is another type of leak that everyone in Washington is familiar with, and that's one where a person wants to get credit for something he or she has done.

"I'm sorry I'm late for dinner, but I'm been working behind the scenes to get a bill passed, which would impeach a federal judge who made a ruling in favor of any desegregation issue that Sen. Jesse Helms disapproves of. If you use my name, play down my role, as a lot of us were involved in the final

Then finally there is what we call the "accidental leak." This might occur at a cocktail party where a reporter goes up to a high government official and says, "I hear you're thinking of raising sugar supports to Brazil." That's a confidential matter,"

"I have it from a good source." "Then you also must have heard we plan to overthrow Grenada."

"Everyone knows that," the reporter fakes it. "If you print it, you could get the minister of cigars in Cuba in a lot of trouble. He works for us." "I had that months ago," the reporter says. "If I told you what we plan to do in El Salvador, will you forget about Brazil? Yeh, but just for now. I can't sit on the sugar quota story forev-

Leontyne Price Ton't Waste My Time on Frivolity ...

By Susan Heller Anderson

New York Times Service

TEW YORK - Prickly at reminders of her longevity as a singer, and at questions about retirement from the opera, Leontyne Price, who has just turned 55, speaks in explosions of half-sentences delivered in a curiously flutey voice. Like the notes the celebrated soprano floats above the orchestra, her phrases hang suspended in midair, punctuated by uproarious laughter and the animated gesticulation of extravagantly bejeweled hands.

She is back onstage at the Met-absence, in the role in which she made her stunning Met debut 21

Like most black opera singers of her generation, Price has expended much energy battling racial prejudice in the opera house.

Unlike most black opera singers,

Price has always had a black personal and business manager, has refused roles she believes unsuitable for a black woman, and has consciously avoided a public rorange, the soprano is a spectacular woman, her hair swathed in a deep purple turban, her almondshaped eyes flashing dramatically, her glowing complexion be-lying her age.

An ebullient, outgoing teenager who sang every chance she got and was also a high school cheerleader. Price studied initially to be a music teacher at Central State College in Wilberforce, Ohio. Paul Robeson sang at a benefit to raise money for her education. The Juilliard School awarded her a four-year scholarship and an old family friend subsidized the soprano so she could live in New York. After Juilliard came a 10-year blitz on the world's stages, begin-ning in 1952 with Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" in New York and Paris. There was an international tour in 1953 in "Porgy and Bess," a Town Hall recital with the composer Samuel Barber as her ac-companist, the title role in "Tosca" on NBC-TV, and debuts with the San Francisco Opera, Vienna Staatsoper, Covent Garden, the Verona Arena, New York Phil-

In the 1960s she was om-nipresent at the Met. "I don't know anyone who contributed more at a time when I couldn't afford it vocally or emotionally. In the 1970s she cut back drastically in the opera house to expand her recital career.

"Today I do exactly as I please — the true sign of success," she said. What she pleases will inchude doing a joint concert at the Met with the mezzo-soprano Marilyn Home on March 28.

'Preparation'

She divides her time between singing and what she calls "liv-ing." "Preparation for life without the instrument," she explained, referring to her voice. Surrounded by a close circle of tending her garden and cooking.
"My mother's recipes, soul food."

Married briefly in the 1950s to the baritone William Warfield, she has lived alone ever since.

"My personal life is my busi-"she insisted. "As long as I'm in this rat race - and I won't be in it much longer - I'll keep my private life discreet."

She is now preparing for a third aspect of her art, teaching. Her teacher, Florence Page Kimball, was central to her career. "It was the most important relation-ship in my life," Price recalled. "Like sex, it was pure chemis-try." Not only did Kimball teach Price singing, she molded her as a performing artist. "She told me there was an innate quality of dignity in my voice, and you tend to move and look like you sound," Price said. "She'd go with us to choose what to wear. Preparing to teach, she said, is like preparing a role. "I'll do a tryout this year to see if I can transfer what I know. I'd like to share my knowledge with young artists." Her first classes will probably be in Europe.

For many years, young black singers have sought her advice, which she gives freely and gen-crously. "It's my time at bat in the American melting pot. I don't want to come off chauvinistically black, which I really am because I'm so proud to be black "

With the same awareness of being black, she has consciously striven for an aura of dignity, which her detractors label "gran-

"If 'grand' means I look digni-fied, don't you think it's time someone did?" she snapped. "Yes, I'm arrogant. I don't waste time on frivolity. I save my energy for what I think is important. If it means I'm grand, well, hello

Her performance at the Metropolitan received mixed reviews. which she shrugged off, prefer ring to read the good ones there as a more mature perform-er and human being," she said. "It doesn't overwhelm me. And this year, I felt love."

While she declines to talk directly about any plans for retirement from the opera stage, she has obviously given it some thought. "My mother told me and my brother always to leave a piece of dessert and not to stay too late. And that's how I'm going to handle this. No trum-pets. I'll be gone — and no one will notice it."

Beatty's 'Reds' Gets 12 Oscar Nominations

Warren Beatty's "Reds" leads the Oscars race with a dozen Academy Award nominations; Henry Fonda and Katharine Hepburn received best actor and actress nominations for their triumphs as an aging couple facing the husband's death in "On Golden Pond," which won 10 nominations that included a supporting actress nomination for Fonda's daughter,

Jane. The ailing Fonds, who never won a competitive Oscar but was presented with an honorary award last year, was last nominated in 1940 for "The Grapes of Wrath."

Beatty, who also never won a competitive Oscar, picked up a record-tying four nominations — for producer, best actor, best director and best original screenplay -- for

"Reds." the saga of American journalist John Reed and the Rustian Revolution. The film is up for 12 Oscars, including Diane Keaton for best actress, Maureen Stapleton for best supporting actress and Jack Nicholson for best supporting actor. "Ragtime" and "Raiders of the Lost Ark," the year's biggest moneymaker, both collected eight nominations, followed by "Chariots of Fire" with seven. In addition to "Reds" and "On Golden Pond," nominations for best picture went to "Atlantic City," "Chariots of Fire" and "Raiders of the Lost Ark." Best actor nominations also went to Burt Lancaster for "Atlantic City," Dudley Moore for "Ar-thur" and Paul Newman for "Ab-sence of Malice." Best actress nominations also went to Marsha Mason for "Only When I Laugh," Snsan Sarandon for "Atlantic City" and Meryl Streep for "The French Lieutenant's Woman."

Other nominees for best supporting actor are James Coco for "Only When I Laugh." John Gielgud for "Arthur," Ism Holm for "Chariots of Fire," and Howard E. Rollins Jr. for "Ragtime." James Cagney, a sentimental favorite for his role in "Ragtime," did not get a nomination. Other nominees for hest supporting actress are Melinbest supporting actress are Melin-da Dillon for "Absence of Malice."

Joan Hackett for "Only When I Laugh" and Eizabeth McGovern for "Ragtime." Besides Beatty, nominations for best director went

Hugh Hudson for "Chariots of Fire," Mark Rydell for "On Gold-en Pond" and Steven Spielberg for

"Raiders of the Lost Ark." Nominated for best foreign language film of the year were "The Boat is Full," Switzerland; "Man of Iron,"

to Louis Malle for "Atlantic City," winners will be announced March A car carrying Prince Philip, hus-band of Queen Elizabeth, was hit by a rock in Frankfurt when spectators boord and threw stones and stink bombs at prominent guests at the Frankfurt Opera Ball. About 1,500 people gathered outside the Opera House to watch the guests arrive, among them about 200 young people who police identified as local troublemakers. Some of the spectators shouted slogans and names at the guests and threw rocks, police said. Prince Philip was not injured. Sophia Loren, saying she wants. "another kind of life," is turning away from the security of a marriage that left her feeling deprived, according to an interview in McCall's magazine. Loren, 47, isrumored to be on the verge of a split with her husband, director Carlo Ponti, according to McCall's. "My attitude now is to go with my feelings and not look for security," Loren said. "I'm going to get what I need as a wom-an. Now I want another kind of life. My needs are different. I want to experiment." Loren said her life with Ponti was orderly and stable, but also left her feeling deprived. In her youth, she said, she felt alone and old, "but now I am enjoying my youth. I do not feel secure and I never will. But who is secure in life? In the end, I am my security." Loren is rumored to be romantically linked to a French doctor, the magazine said. Australian solo yachtsman Jon Saunders finished one trip round the world, and after a two-hour stopover — without touching land — headed out to sea on a record second west-east nonstop circumnavigation. Before he arrived in Hobart, Tasmania, bachelor Saunders, 42, hadn't seen another human being for five months, since he left Fremantie, Western Austra-lia, on Sept. 6. Saunders said he had taken to talking to himself to keep his voice from failing because "I discovered I was very hoarse when I spoke on the radio." Meanwhile lone British yachtsman David Scott-Cowper, 39, arrived in Albany, West Australia, half-way toward his attempt to set a record for the more difficult east-west circumnavigation. He left England in September. Both men are sailing 36-footers.
